Two great things are going to happen before many of those now here have gone to their reward. The great peoples of the east, black, brown, yellow and white, are going to turn to the Lord Jesus Christ as the rational solution of their problem of life. How they apprehend him, how they understand him, how they follow him and how they obey him will depend largely on the men who during the next twenty-five years say, "I will go." The influx of such enormous numbers of converts bringing with them a heavy load of prejudice and superstition, and a subtile, but all permeating, aroma of occult philosophy, will subject the church to such an internal strain as she has not endured since she absorbed the philosophies of Greece and Rome.

Here on the foreign field will be the battleground of giants. The priests of error and superstition are not proposing to yield victory unfought for. If a chance to be in at the last great battle between the truth and the organized forces of superstition is not inspiration enough, one need only look at the wonderful aggregate of humanity, sometimes called the heathen world, see them as sheep without a shepherd, hear their inarticulate call for help and guidance as they grope their way in myriads toward the light, to feel that here are lands, and these are people, and this is work, worth while.

Unification.

The second great thing that is going to happen is the unification of the church of Christ in foreign lands. This unification is going to be preceded and accompanied by a re-formation of the church—along lines different and in some respects divergent from those now dominant in the west.

While the church at home wearies herself in making plans and discussing bases of union, the church in foreign lands will have united. The character of that union, the form and doctrine of the church of the future, the efficiency and simplicity of that church, will depend on the men who during the next twenty-five years say, "I will go."

On the foreign field men and plans and theories and bases, brought face to face with unbelief, are tried as by fire, and the imperishable verities of the faith stand out clear cut and unmistakable.

There is not a problem connected with the administration of the church, the conservation of the faith, the deepening of the spiritual life, which is not a liver issue today on the mission field than in most parts of the home field. Nor is there one in the solution of which individual ability and godly character will not count for more than the same ability and character would have counted for at home. The home church cannot escape the reflex influence of the solution of these problems found on the foreign field.

The situation calls for really great men, and really great men are finding it worth while to respond to the call. It calls for men of faith, men of purpose, men of prudence, men of vision.

The Measure of Success.

The foreign field with its missionaries bears somewhat the same relation to the home lands that the west and north bear to the settled communities of New England. It is no place for men of timid or slack nature. It will not make great men of men who have not got greatness in them. It is not the object of this paper to make foreign mission service seem an easy or sure road to that success which eludes the man at home. What we want to do is to remove the impression that there is no scope for the development of really big men. I do not think that anyone can study out in detail the conditions which I have mentioned without being profoundly impressed by the fact that the foreign mission field is the land of opportunity for any man who has ability and measures success by any other than a monetary standard.

Charles M. Sheldon and His Church

An Appreciation

BY F. W. BURNHAM.

When my friend, C. G. Kindred, of Chicago, said, at the convention, that he believed he could better appreciate President Ainslie's address if he should first go and stand in the church where Charles M. Sheldon ministers, I was reminded that the author of "In His Steps" is a Congregational minister of Topeka, Kan., and that we were at that moment in his parish. So I joined my friend in our first pilgrimage to that shrine.

The Building.

A short street-car ride brought us to the Central Congregational Church, which, by the way, is not "central," but is located in a residence district near to Washburn College. Here we found a modern gothic structure of good stone wrought in pleasing lines with churchly effect, having ample accommodations for a congregation of six or eight hundred members. The church was open and we entered. The interior is without decoration or fresco; but artistic with its grey walls and dark furniture. After visiting the sanctuary we stepped into the parish house, passed an open door, which proved to be that of the pastor's study, and were greeted with a hearty invitation to come in. The voice was that of Mr. Sheldon himself. He was seated at his desk in the very process of writing his forthcoming story entitled, "The High Calling." This book will be issued from the presses about January 1.

The Minister.

Mr. Sheldon is a man of good physique, having spent some of the years of youth on a farm in Dakota. He has slightly stooped shoulders, a clear grey eye, large round head with grey hair tending toward baldness, a good firm jaw; he appears a little nervous in his speech and movements; but his presence is manly and assuring, and his address direct and businesslike. He talked freely about religious conditions, and when the conversation turned to his own field and his rather unique methods, he spoke with frankness and freedom, but with becoming modesty.

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D. D.

Charles M. Sheldon was born in Wellsville, N. Y., in 1857. His father, the Rev. Stewart Sheldon, provided for his education at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass.; Brown University and Andover Theological Seminary. Later, Mr. Sheldon studied social problems in London. Returning to America he took a pastorate at Waterbury, Vt. Twenty-one years ago he came to Topeka to be pastor of the church which he still serves. From meager beginnings, his church has had a steady and substantial growth. Patient sowing has brought its harvest.

While Mr. Sheldon is most widely known for his stories, he is a man of varied gifts. In his church leaflet we found that the Communion hymns were written by him, and they are worthy a place in any hymnal. Here is a sample of pointed paragraphs taken from the same leaflet:

"Complaint never adds anything to the machinery but the need of more oil."

"Perhaps your mother's Christian faith is not scholarly. But it is infinitely better than your scholarly criticism of it."

"The most useless man in the world is he who pays to see other people fight the great fight of life."

No Sunday Evening Preaching.

But it is of his work with his young people, which is the occasion of his stories, that we would speak particularly. Mr. Sheldon says he cannot prepare two sermons each week, and that his people don't need them if he could. He has a large attendance of the adult membership at the morning worship. Here he delivers his spiritual message of "strong meat for them who are of full age." But the evening hour is for his young folks, and the elders are frankly requested to remain at home. Believing that a wholesome home life is conducive to spirituality, Mr. Sheldon advises his busy business and professional and laboring men to stay at home Sunday evenings with the younger children of their families while he entertains the more mature young people with a story at the church. This story-reading is presented, however, only through the autumn months. After the Holidays the only evening services are those of the Christian Endeavor Societies, with the pastor present in his study for counsel or advice from five to eight o'clock. The reasons for this course are grounded in Mr. Sheldon's grasp of the normal conditions of young life.

In the past twenty years Mr. Sheldon has written some twenty books, all of which have been read, chapter by chapter, to his congregations of young people, in lieu of a sermon. The most famous of these, "In His Steps," has been translated into German, French, Swedish, Spanish, Italian, Armenian, Russian, and some of the languages of the Orient and the dialects of central and western Africa.

It was our privilege, last Sunday night, to be present at the reading of a chapter of the new book he is soon to publish, "The High Calling." This story was begun last year, but because many of the students of the college are absent during the vacation time, it was discontinued until this autumn. It is being published week by week in the "Daily Capitol" of Topeka, for the benefit of home readers.

Christian Endeavor Active.

Arriving at the church at an early hour on Sunday night, we stepped into the meeting of the Senior Christian Endeavor Society, to find present about one hundred and fifty young people, mostly college students, having much such a meeting as is common to all our churches. Mr. Sheldon came into the meeting and spoke briefly upon the topic the young people were discussing. He told an incident of local life illustrating the theme and bearing a direct spiritual message. Leaving this group, he went into the meeting of the Intermediates, and there too gave a brief, pointed message.

When these Christian Endeavor services were over, the young people came pouring into the auditorium of the church, chatting and laughing quietly, but with freedom of their buoyant spirits as if they were entering the parlors of their own homes. They were apparently not unmindful that this was a church, but it was also their Father's house, and they were not afraid nor embarrassed.

There was no choir. One of the young men played the pipe organ. When all had assembled, some four or five hundred young people were present. The singing was of the good old church hymns, stately and grand. All sang with a will. A selection was read responsively; but there was no prayer in the opening services. After the reading, while the organ played an interlude, the offering was taken, which, Mr. Sheldon announced, was for the work of the Christian Endeavor Societies.

A New Story Begun.

Then came the story. The pastor read in a conversational voice. The plot was laid in a mission station in Arizona, where Mr. Sheldon's own church supports missionary labors among the Indians and frontiersmen. This chapter of the story abounds in action, good descriptions of landscape, dramatic situations and character sketches, and sparkles with wit and humor which frequently brought a ringing round of laughter from the youthful audience. A neat love story binds the incidents together, and through all runs the thread of a narrative of heroic deeds, sacrifice and noble devotion on the part of a young lady missionary which constitutes the theme of "The High Calling." When the chapter was ended there was no additional word of application or exhortation. A hymn was announced rather abruptly. Again the hearty singing, and then the evening prayer. And this closing prayer revealed the true heart of the pastor. It was the prayer of a father praying for his children; natural, normal, dealing with the practical, human interests of their daily lives. Softly the organ followed the prayer, lifting its petitions on waves of harmony to the Throne of Grace. Then there was a period of impressive silence, seemingly of several minutes in duration, broken at last as the pastor arose from his knees. The congregation stood, and the glad chatter of young, happy hearts testified that the evening had been a pleasant as well as a profitable one.

Strong Hold on Young People.

That the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon has a strong hold upon the hearts of his young people is attested not only by their attendance at these evening church services, but much more by the tender regard in which they speak of his relation to them, and by the freedom with which they consult him upon the affairs of their lives. That in rendering this service to the youth of his fold he has neglected no essential care of the adult life is witnessed by the substantial growth and benevolent activities of his church, as well as by the most generous comment of the entire community.

Over the door to the parish-house of his church is carved the words, "Come let us live with our children." Mr. Sheldon is a builder of the best home-life for his city. In addition to his parish duties he has carried forward some important work along social and industrial lines. I am informed that all the income from his literary labors is devoted to benevolent enterprises. This author-preacher is frank to say that his methods might not apply to another field; but here is a minister who has faced squarely the problems of his own community, and has done much toward their healthy solution.

Our Readers' Opinions

"But," says brother Armstrong, "this is doctrinal and divisive." So might it be. He said it would be. But because his doctrine divides shall we presume to invent to ourselves a doctrine that we think will not divide—which, indeed, we could not do? Nay, verily. Let us walk in the light as he is in the light and in the division endeavor to enjoy his fellowship above the fellowship of any or all others.

Concerning Church Statistics

Editor Christian Century: I very much enjoyed and profited by the article in a recent issue of The Century entitled "If I were a Preacher Again." Whoever the author is he writes most instructively and sensibly withal.

I was particularly impressed with what he had to say relative to church statistics—their unreliability and their deceptive side. I think I am in a position to appreciate this part of his paper especially. The church to which I minister has a membership that totaled at our annual meeting held two weeks ago 1729. Moreover, this large number is bona fide in a sense—that is the names and addresses are not only on our rolls but in most cases the people can be found here in our city. Indeed the number of members we report is conservative. There are persaps fifty or 100 more who claim membership with our congregation who are not counted in the 1729. But in another sense this number is not a bona fide list of our membership. I should say that not more than 40 per cent of this large number attend regularly the services and the highest number we ever had at one time on our contributing list was 785. Hundreds of these peoples are little more than "names" in so far as any definite service in, or fellowship with the church is concerned. Yet, we carry them on our rolls and report them at our annual meeting—with some explanation it is true.

For two years, we have been planning to revise the church rolls and this year are expecting to lay hold of the problem seriously but it is a Herculean task and one beset with many perplexities.

There is still another thing to be said relative to a large membership of this sort and it is one nearly always overlooked. However "nominal," many hundreds may be to the church they are not so to the pastor. They cannot be, for they look to him in times of sickness and death in the home or at the marriage service. He could not ignore them if he would and certainly would not if he could. They are frequently on his mind and the burden of his prayers. It is not difficult to account for a condition of this sort which exists more or less in every church of above 1,000 members. The four years and two months I have been pastor here there have been 931 additions of which 695 came in through "big meetings." There is not a congregation among the Disciples nor in any other communion of which I have any knowledge that can assimilate successfully such a great company into the church en masse. It would take a score of paid workers to do it half way satisfactorily, and a consecrated membership supporting solidly such an effort.

It is a grand and thrilling sight to see people come by the hundreds into the church but there is another side to the matter that must give every thoughtful minister food for serious reflection.

There are no adequate means or methods in any of our churches for taking care of half a thousand converts at a time. I am not saying that we should never permit people to come by the hundreds until we do have such methods. I am simply trying to state a condition that we face, which after the "shouting and the tumult dies" confronts continually and cannot be blinked away. And here, right here, is the reason why many a minister breaks down nervously, or goes to his grave before his time,—the fact that hundreds claim him as pastor into whose lives and homes he can seldom or never go, that many are on the rolls of his church whom he would passionately like to reach personally for a definite service yet with the manifold duties that must be done daily, the committees that must be met, the sermons and addresses to prepare, the sick that must be visited, the round of activities pressing him—under such conditions he can no more reach that nominal membership than Dives could go to Lazarus nor can any assistant quite do for him the ministry he fain would do himself yet cannot do. Rainier of the Last Frontier

BY JOHN MARVIN DEAN AUTHOR OF
"THE PROMOTION, ETC."

CHAPTER I.

"There is a pleasure sure in being mad
Which none but madmen know."

It was out on the old red Arlington dock that Clark Rainier went back into sin. His own fault absolutely. Tomorrow was to have begun his new career as city editor of "The Seattle Spirit" in the office of that great nerve-center of the Northwest. Today he reasoned, he would turn from the pleased but repugnant face of the uncle who had bombarded him with arguments prosaic, and led him into a solemn vow to abandon the vagabond habits of a "war special" and settle down to as steady a career as Seattle would permit. Today he would slip down the Madison Street cable line, bask in the sunshine of the bustling water-front, and try to forget absolutely that he had, up on "the first hill," a steamer trunk scratched and dented, and filled with precious, useless things from five campaigns and three continents.

You can understand how it was with him as he crossed the network of tracks with which the Wizard of St. Paul, even back in '99, had pre-empted the city-front. Dodging amongst interminable lines of brown cars, he at length came out to the lap-lapping of the tide-water against the docks. The mere smell of the old Arlington as he stood in its hospitable entrance and looked down the long columns of whitewashed fir, nearly won him away from his vows. And the name-roll of the Northwest, written on nearby bows and sterns and pilot houses, aided in his disintegration of character. Anacortes, Seward, Victoria, Port Townsend, Whatcom, Vancouver, Gray's Harbor, Tacoma, Portland, Skagway, Sitka, Port Gamble, Dutch Harbor, Yokahama, Nagasaki, Shanghai! Awkward words for eastern tongues, but cabalistic syllables to the men of the last frontier.

But the resolutions of a conscientious man are robust things, and neither the crowded, nestling craft in the slips, nor the keen whip of the sun-shot November air, nor the mingled odors of the mighty shapeless piles of fragrant freight were able to entirely overcome the effects of yesterday's seance with Uncle Jimmy. It was reserved for the homely bulk of the old transport "Hyson" to give the vital stab to his better nature and make him as false as Iago.

One sight of her was enough.

She was lying in the slip just south of the Arlington, and the red-white-blue of her funnel mark and the "U. S. C. T." on her high, white stern broke the hold of righteous Uncle Jimmy with most terrible ease. Add to these allurements the heavenly rattle of her donkey-engines and the sight of big yellow cases going up over and into her, and the re-creation of the war-correspondent became complete.

Rainier went over beside her and passed a brown hand along her rough plates with a genuine caress. The last time he had seen her she was carrying Shafter and his staff back in triumph from the Cuban War.

"When does she clear?" he asked a blocky mate who stood awaiting the back-swing of the forward loading boom.

"She ought to steam out near midnight."

"Oregon horses and quartermaster's supplies for Manila?"

The man nodded and turned scowling and shouting to his tackle.

Instinctively aware that he had lost his battle for decency, Rainier passed shamefacedly along the dock to the Great Northern tracks, dodged a presumptuous little switch engine, and found himself five minutes later at the Postal Telegraph office wiring to his warm friend, General Silas Burt, Chief Quartermaster, Washington, D. C.

"That should get me transportation," he said cheerfully to himself as, gathering the momentum of his wicked resolution, he hurried over to the home of "The Seattle Spirit."

The place was still and dead with the peaceful aftermath following the daily battle with the great edition. Only a clerk or two, a leisurely reporter and the business manager decorated the littered offices.

"One day ahead of schedule, old war-horse," said the business manager, with curiosity in his eyes.

"All off," laughed the sinner, "I go to Manila tonight with my old friend the "Hyson." Tell the chief, will you Givens? I can't face him. If he wants any of my stuff from the Islands, tell him to write me at Manila. Or better, wire me at Nagasaki. Stop staring and wish me good luck, old chap. I've got to deal with Uncle Jimmy."

Givens had pulled out his corn-cob and held it out at a dramatic angle as this speech smote him. And with his mouth still open, he contributed a convulsive hand-grip at the invitation of Rainier's outstretched palm. Before he could properly phrase his surprise, the backslider had slammed the glass door, waved a general adieu to the clerks and the reporter, and disappeared from view. The business manager sank back in his seat and sagely remarked to the reporter, "It's in his blood. You can't anchor him. But he's passing up a mighty good job, and what Uncle James Alexander Denny will say to his brilliant nephew will not be proper reading for the younger social set."

But two blocks from the office of "The Spirit" the brilliant nephew proved his brilliancy by suddenly determining not to task his rigorous kinsman's powers as an "adjectivist." He cast an almost apprehensive glance from the tail of his eye at the second-story gold lettering of that prominent Seattleites' spacious real-estate office and caught with relief a cable car that shot him up over one of the most spectacular grades in the city to his quarters at the Lincoln. Here he locked himself in his room, sang out into that good old Sword Song of Ferrara, and rummaged to his own music amongst the afore-mentioned precious things, selecting therefrom most judiciously his compact Cuban campaign kit, squeezed it with savage joy into a suit case, stuffed certain identifying papers into an inner pocket, and then composed, not without the grace of a blush, a humble but firm note for the enlightenment of Uncle Jimmy.

This all carried him past three o'clock, and the banks were closed. But he had fortunately received a liberal draft from a New York paper in payment for a special assignment some weeks before, and he hastily folded it into a vest pocket.

At half past five he swung out of the side entrance of the Lincoln, dressed in his comfortable old suit of grey street clothes, and pulled his hat well down to avoid casual recognitions.

But at the Postal Telegraph he found no answer awaiting him from General Burt, and he thoughtfully wended his way to a nearby quiet cafe for dinner. He worried a little as he ate, and at seven o'clock was vacillating between the telegraph office and the dock, where he could hear the steady thrumming of the Hyson's steam in the gathering darkness.

At seven-thirty he was informed that his telegram to General Burt had not been delivered, as the difference between Washington time and Seattle time had brought it to Washington after the Q. M. D. had closed for the night.

For a moment he stood gloomily reproaching himself for his singular dullness in not taking this into account, and then, knowing the necessity of getting Burt's order for transportation on the "Hyson," he began desperately to summon the General's residence number from out the depths of his subconscious self. Alas! the coveted item remained obdurately elusive, and with a growing anxiety he hurried back to the waterfront. Enough light still lingered in the sky to show the ragged line of the Olympic mountains against the west, but the waters of the great sound intervening were as black as ink, and at another time he would have admired the many bead-like strings of cabin lights showing against its density.

He now went directly to the ghostly bulk of the "Hyson" and his keen eye could see that the loading was at an end and that the big horse-transport would leave her berth long before midnight. An ominous quiet was regnant on the wharf and the steady hum of the warning steam emphasized his present dilemma. Somewhere on the deck high above him he knew a watchful guard was quietly eyeing all approaching figures, ready to discourage stowaways with violence, if necessary. He knew that bluffs are of little service when dealing with Uncle Sam, and that but two ways of going to the Orient on the "Hyson" were open to him—either an order from Burt or a sneak past the guard. To succeed in the latter plan might mean unpleasant experiences on the morrow; to fail might mean either rough handling or, not unlikely, a bullet. And such an alternative was the necessary spice of attraction to a young fellow who had already followed Edhem Pasha across Thessaly in '97, fellowshipped with the great Stevens in the Soudan; and under his own flag on the clumsy old Texas, written the brezziest of all descriptions of the battle of Santiago while said battle sang its wicked song over the face of the waters for miles on either side of his scratching pencil.

There is a proverb that runs, "If thou wouldst hear others, be a son of silence thyself." Standing, suit-case in hand, well under the curve of the warehouse roof, Rainier awaited some evidence of the position of the guard. From time to time a light passed along the "Hyson's" deck, casual sentences came through the night air to him, and, finally at the head of the passenger gangway still leading from the dock to the waist of the steamer, he caught the outline of the guard. He could be no other than a soldier, for a moment later he began a little song of the day, humming it for a line or so, and even breaking out into the cheerful sentences of the chorus.

An Autumn Picture

Grace Wood Castle.

From my window a little brown house I see
With a tiny door-yard and a wide-spreading tree;
Through boughs bare and brown, on the carpet of leaves
The sunlight a shimmering pattern weaves.

Just at the tree's foot, where the brown leaves lie deep
And the sunshine falls warm, lie two babies asleep;
Small Bobby with brown curly head is at rest,
His little brown puppy hugged close to his breast.

If I were an artist a picture I'd make,
And swiftly I'd paint lest the brown babies wake;
House, tree, child and dog should all be put down,
And my picture I'd name: "A Study in Brown."

Because God Knew

Bertha Burnham Bartlett.

The Reverend Jaspar Kingsbury was an impulsive man, and when on a certain never-to-be-forgotten occasion he received an injury at the hands of a man within his parish his heart burned within him, with the result that he wrote at once a sharp, concise letter to the offender; with the firm intention of mailing the same in the morning.

The hours that followed were sleepless ones for the clergyman. Writhing under the sense of injury, and still more distressed by the fact that he found it impossible for him to offer his customary prayer at bed-time, the night was one of torture. With the morning light, however, he again took his pen, writing a letter which in place of the angry note of the night before he sent to the man who had transgressed. It was very brief—only these words, "My Brother: Only three of us know the truth about the matter; you and I and God. Your pastor, Jaspar Kingsbury."

With a mind singularly at rest, the minister went about his duties during the weeks that followed, occasionally meeting the man who had wronged him, and always with the frank friendliness for which he was famed. If the other winced under the undeserved courtesy he made no sign. Meanwhile, the minister prayed and waited.

And then one night the end came, when Hartley Baxter, the man who had falsified against the clergyman, placing him in the position where he was obliged to assume a large debt, died suddenly. The minister, sighing a little because no longer there were three who knew the truth, was yet glad that the bitter recrimination of his first letter had never been seen by the dead man's eyes. God knew; and he. Why wish that more were knowing to the occurrence?

It was the dead man's wish that Mr. Kingsbury conduct his funeral, and tenderly this last office for the other was performed. He told of Hartley Baxter's kind-heartedness, his generosity, his good qualities generally, and people said wonderingly that they had not suspected an attachment had existed between the clergyman and the parishioner before.

Later the dead man's will was read. To the astonishment of all and particularly of the pastor, reference was made to the trouble between the testator and his pastor. In the disposal of his property a sum sufficient to liquidate the debt wrongly fastened upon the clergyman was set aside for the purpose, with the statement: "Three know the justice of this act: I, the man who has borne the burden uncomplainingly for two years, and the God to Whom I am going, and who in this last day of my life has forgiven me for the sake of Him whom Jaspar Kingsbury follows." The date of the will was that of Baxter's decease.

The minister's relief upon hearing of the settlement of the debt which had seemed likely to overshadow his whole life ere he could hope to wipe it out, was unmistakable. Yet deeper was his thanksgiving that divine grace had been vouchsafed him, that thus he had been allowed to portray in a small measure the forgiving life of Him to Whom in Hartley Baxter's last hours on earth the erring man had turned. Because God knew that a concrete example of divine love was necessary to bring Hartley Baxter to a knowledge of God the wrong of the past had been permitted, the while he, Jaspar Kingsbury, not only had been brought nearer to his Lord thereby, but had been—could he doubt it—thus the means of bringing another live.

A Game That Educates

Grace Wood Castle.

Five dollars put out at interest, the income to be used in the education of your children, would not yield enough to be worth while; but five dollars used in the way I suggest will surely help them to acquire proficiency in figures and also an understanding of their use in every-day life. It is the concrete as opposed to the abstract, and even the dull child who "just hates arithmetic" will enjoy and profit by it.

You remember that the old recipe for cooking a hare began: "First catch your hare,"—so I'll begin directions for this game with the advice: "First catch your five dollar bill." Having succeeded in this, have it changed into coin as follows: One dollar, two halves, four quarters, ten dimes, ten nickels and fifty pennies. Take charge of this yourself, keeping it in a box or bag entirely separate from other money and counting it carefully each time after using.

Duplicate your daily transactions with the grocer, butcher, baker, milkman, etc., allowing each child to be buyer, and seller by turns. Always play with them yourself or have some other competent person do so lest errors creep into their calculations. Allow them pencils and paper, but insist that as much as possible of the work be done mentally.

You will shortly find that they are unconsciously learning the real use of addition, subtraction, multiplication, division and decimal and common fractions and incidentally a great deal about prices and values. The knowledge and practice thus gained will be of inestimable value to them in after life where so many are handicapped for want of it.

Try it a few months, little mother, to give it a fair test. At the end of that time you will still have your five dollars, your children will have profited as a result of this play of "Making Change," and I feel sure that I shall have your thanks for a practical suggestion.

The "Executive" Dog

The authorities in hundreds of cities and towns in Germany employ specially trained dogs for detective work, and it is reported that wherever they have been used, crime has decreased all the way from one-fourth to one-half. Criminals, especially burglars and highwaymen, are more afraid of one such dog than of a whole squad of police. And well they might be, if the dogs are as efficient as they are claimed to be. By careful breeding, a variety has been produced which has been called the "executive dog." They are as keen-scented as the bloodhound, and it is claimed that they can hear slight sounds, such as is made by a man walking, or the breaking of a twig, at the distance of a quarter of a mile. The authorities of the British navy have established a number of stations for the training and use of these executive, or detective, dogs. Although they are of a savage temper, they are carefully taught to do no injury if it can be avoided. One of their duties is to aid in the recovery of deserters. By some instinct they soon come to know who should and who should not be about the Government premises at night.—Boy Life.

A Feathered Thief

Last year a lady who was very fond of flowers had planted some seeds in a certain part of her garden, and had put little sticks into the ground above them, with tiny slips of paper fastened to them, telling the names of the flowers that were to come up there.

To her surprise, these little slips of paper began to disappear, two one day, three the next, and so on.

"Well," she thought, "I never imagined any one would take the trouble to steal those; and, if they did, I should have thought they would have taken them all, not one or two here and there!"

For a long time she could not find out who was the thief, and then one day, as she stood by a window overlooking the garden, she saw a blackbird coming hopping along. He seized one of the little tickets and pulled and tugged at it, but it wouldn't come!

So he passed on to the next, and at last pulled it off and flew away with it. Presently he came back and did the same thing again, and later on the lady found out why he had helped himself to her carefully prepared little slips. What do you think he was doing with them? Why, carrying them to a tree near by, and using them to help in building his nest there.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

—Sir Hiram Maxim, who is now seventy, after having devoted years to the construction of a biplane which has been described as "the Pullman of the air," has announced that he has abandoned his experiments with aerial machinery, influenced by his advanced age.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6.

Theme for the Day.—The All-Seeing Father.

Scripture.—Thou art a God that seeth.—Gen. 16:13.

And there is no creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and laid open before the eyes of him with whom we have to do.—Heb. 4:13.

God keeps his holy mysteries
  Just on the outside of man's dream,
In diapason slow, we think
  To hear their opinions rise and sink,
While they float pure beneath His eye
  Like swans adown a stream.

Prayer.—Holy Father, we adore Thee for Thy wisdom and power. Thou knowest all things. Before Thee the universe lies spread out as a scroll to be read through at a glance Our fullest knowledge is but the faintest glimmering of light compared with the splendor of Thy perfect vision. We are allured and baffled by the world of truth that lies just beyond our reach. But Thou knowest, and wilt give us time to learn. May we find comfort in Thy omniscience, and strive after the fuller wisdom which eternity alone can reveal. We ask for Thy mercy's sake.—Amen.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 7.

Theme for the Day.—If we knew—

Scripture.—He knoweth the way that I take.—Job. 23:10.

For our light affliction, which is for the moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory.—2 Cor. 4:17.

If we could push ajar the gates of life,
  And stand within, and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
  And for each mystery could find a key.
  —M. R. Smith ("God Knoweth Best")

Prayer.—Gracious God, we are fenced about with limitation, mystery and trouble. At times we know not whither we should turn our steps. Our work seems little wort, and our difficulties too great to be overcome. Yet if we could know as Thou knowest, we believe we should see the value of all our experiences, and know how life grows rich through the discipline of sorrow and of toil. We believe that Thou holdest the keys of life, and that in Thine own good time we too shall understand. Confirm our faith, for Christ, our Savior's sake.—Amen.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Ideal of Friendship.

Scripture.—But there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.—Prov. 18:24.

Faithful are the wounds of a friend. Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart. So doth the sweetness of a man's friend that cometh of hearty counsel. Thine own friend and thy father's friend, forsake not.—Prov. 27:6, 9, 10.

The best friend is horizon, too,
Lifting unseen things into view,
And widening every petty claim
Till lost in some sublimer aim,
Blending all barriers in the great
Infinities that round us wait.
Friendship is an eternity
Where soul with soul walks, heavenly free.
—Lucy Larcom ("The Inalienable Bond")

Prayer.—Our Father, Thou hast honored us past all our deserving in making us Thy friends. We would choose aright our other friends, so that they may not be unworthy of Thy companionship. Aid us that we may render to all who love us the high services of true friendship. May we give and claim such inspiration and uplift from this fellowship as shall yield the best returns in character. And may the fellowship of noble and generous natures in this world fit us for the society of the Sons of God in a world without end.—Amen.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

Theme for the Day.—The Hosts of God.

Scripture.—And Elisha prayed, and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.—2 Kings 6:17.

Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to do service for the sake of them that shall inherit salvation?—Heb. 1:14.

Their steps, their tones we cannot hear
  Through fleshly barriers interposed,
We cannot set them standing near
  Because our inner eyes are closed.

These opened, we might turn like him
  Who stood beside the ancient Seer,
And see the hosts of cherubim,
  Rank over glittering rank, appear.
—Rev. T. Hempsted ("The World of Spirits")

Prayer.—O Thou Father of our spirits, the Source and Sustainer of our lives, we thank Thee that beyond the blessings of human fellowship, we have the favoring presence of divine forces all about us. Yet Thou hast surrounded us with angels and ministers of grace for guidance, protection and comfort. Give us confidence and steadiness in the assurance of this truth, and like him of Dothan. may our eyes be opened to see the chariots of God upon the mountains round about.—Amen.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10.

Theme for the Day.—The Call to Prophethood.

Scripture.—I have appointed thee a prophet unto the nations. Then said I, Ah Lord God! behold, I cannot speak; for I am a child. But the Lord said unto me, Say not, I am a child; for to whomsoever I shall send thee thou shalt go, and whatsoever I shall command thee thou shalt speak.—Jer. 1:5-7.

Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink.—Ex. 17:6.

Art thou not prophet nor leader? What then?
Smite! Become prophet! Thus God exalts men,
Smite first, strive first; let us see what avails.
'Tis trying succeeds, 'tis refusal that fails,
Delve down, if thou must, through the flintiest stuff.
So the water springs forth, thou art prophet enough!
—James Buckham ("Smiting the Rock")

Prayer.—Dear Father, we thank Thee for the great and good men whom Thou hast called to be prophets of the faith. We are grateful that with divine insistence Thou hast summoned them to bear witness to the truth. We know that our times need prophets as truly as any age gone by. Do Thou call Thy servants afresh to noble service, and if we should hear Thy voice in summons to the tasks of the kingdom, may we not refuse, but arise and smite the rock that the waters may come forth for a thirsty world. We pray in Jesus' name.—Amen.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

Theme for the Day. The Revealing of the Sons of God.

Scripture.—For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God.—Rom. 8:19.

For brass I will bring gold, and for iron I will bring silver, and for wood brass, and for stones iron; I will also make thy officers peace, and thy exactors righteousness. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, desolation nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise.—Isa. 60:17, 18.

And other spirits there are standing apart
  Upon the forehead of the age to come;
These will give the world another heart
  And other pulses. Hear ye not the hum
Of mighty workings in the human mart?
  Listen awhile ye nations and be dumb.
  —John Keats ("Great Spirits Now On Earth.")

Prayer.—Divine Father and Redeemer, we have read the story of Thy self-revealing in the lives of men who were worthy to be called the Sons of God. We know that through such men all the truths of nature and of grace have been made known to the world. We look for still further disclosures of the powers of nature and of the skill of man, and these too must come through the revealing of the sons of God. Glorify Thyself in the work of all Thy servants, as Thou hast glorified Thyself once for all in the work of Christ.—Amen.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12.

Theme for the Day.—The Fight for Truth.

Scripture.—Finally be strong in the Lord and the strength of his might. Put on the whole armor of God. For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places.—Eph. 6:10, 12.

I therefore go, and join head, heart, and hand,
Active and firm, to fight the bloodless fight
Of science, freedom, and the truth in Christ.
  —Coleridge ("Reflections.")

Prayer.—We praise Thee, our God, for the chance to put our strength to the test in the great and solemn warfare against ignorance, superstition, servitude, selfishness and all that is base and unlovely in human life. Like true soldiers of Jesus Christ, armed with the weapons of the Spirit, we would count ourselves happy in having a place in the struggle. And may our strength be in the Savior, who has led the fight and ever leads. In His name.—Amen.

We are drawn to Christ by the deep and restful sense that we are known. Here is a man who understands us thoroughly: who knows what we most need and what we crave for. And it is in response to that—which is the gospel call—that we turn our back on the grave as Mary did, to find at our side One who has conquered death, and who lives to be our Friend for evermore.—G. H. Morrison.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Signs of the Times*

Our temperance lessons have come with perplexing irregularity during the past year. There was one on February 20 which used as its text the Golden Rule section of the Sermon on the Mount; there was one on May 8, based upon the "Woe" paragraph in Proverbs 23; there was one on September 25, which used Paul's words regarding flesh and spirit in the Epistle to the Galatians. The fourth of the series is chosen from our Lord's words to the disciples regarding the approaching disasters which they might expect, and the necessity of watchfulness.

The selection of this text for a temperance lesson is a rather surprising departure from the custom that has prevailed in the past. There is no reference whatever in the words of our Lord here quoted to anything resembling the sin of intemperance or the need of its restraint. Yet the entire passage is singularly appropriate when once its historical connections are understood, for this was a part of Jesus' warning to the disciples that his kingdom was about to be established in the earth amid disasters and sufferings that they must regard as the sign of the times. He was about to leave them, but he would come back again very soon, not in open and visible form, but in the beginnings of his world-wide manifestation through the church and the transformation of human society. His disciples must watch for these outward signs which indicated the inner and unseen transformation of the world.

The Use of Scripture.

In all this there is, of course, no reference to temperance. Even the allusion in verse 38 to the people who were eating and drinking in the times of Noah, when the flood overtook them, has no reference to the sin of drunkard-making or the organized power of the liquor traffic as we know it today. But there is a certain suggestiveness all the way through this passage of scripture which may be applied to the problem of casting out the sin of drunkenness from American life in our generation. To be sure this may seem hardly an honest way to deal with a biblical text. Too much of the preaching and teaching in the past has been of this fanciful character. But if we start with the frank acknowledgement that we are not trying to find out what the text really teaches, but our only concern is to make it teach the thing we have in mind, there may be some apology for the method.

Jesus asked his disciples to watch for certain signs that were the proof of his coming in the new order of the kingdom of God. That is always the business of his friends. The present moment is full of signs of the coming of his power in the overthrow of the greatest evil our modern life has ever encountered. The saloon is the foe of every cherished interest of a Christian country. It gathers to itself all the attendant vices which ruin a community. Without the saloon few of these vices would flourish in such a way as to become so profitable as they are with the help of the liquor business. But the signs of the times are encouraging beyond words. The saloon is fighting a battle of life and death, and the promise of its overthrow grows brighter daily.

The Coming Overthrow.

The Master said that the generation then living would not pass until the events of which he spoke should have their fulfilment. May we not confidently affirm that the saloon is doomed to fall within the generation now coming upon the stage of action? We may grant that liquors of one sort and another will be made to the end of the chapter, but their bold and conscienceless exploitation will not be permitted to go on by communities that have learned their power to curb and exterminate this deadly enemy of sobriety and happiness. The friends of temperance have it in their power to annhilate the saloon within the present generation. That they propose to do their utmost to bring about this consummation is not to be questioned.

The Master said that heaven and earth should pass away, but his word should be confirmed. His word includes the promise that all evil shall be overthrown and that every knee shall bow to the authority of righteousness in the world. That promise must be fulfilled. Sooner might the heavens fall and the earth drop from its circle than the words of the Master based upon his penetrating knowledge of the laws of the universe, fail of fulfilment.

The Sign of Noah.

Jesus spoke of the carelessness with which men were living in the days when Noah preached his gospel of righteousness. They were indifferent to the call to repentance and the holy life. They ate and drank, they married and enjoyed themselves without reflection upon the certainty of a coming change. There are many people in the same mood today. To them life is simply the chance to have a good time, to make money no matter at whose expense, to realize their selfish ambitions no matter who suffers. The men who are engaged in the traffic of strong drink are of this class, and perhaps they are the best example of the conscienceless life.

But there is disaster ahead for all such. In the days of Noah the flood came and swept away the godless and irreverent generation who had scorned the warning of the Man of good will and scoffed at his predictions of impending trouble. Nothing has been more insolent than the bravado and swagger of the saloon in American life. It has darkened the air with the smoke of its chimneys, it has polluted the atmosphere with the reek of its liquors, it has ruined cities both physically and morally by the crushing blight of its grip upon its victims and the moral taint of its corrupting influence in politics. But its doom hastens because it has set itself against all that is holy and right. The saloon is fated to overthrow, and that soon.

Watching the Signs.

Even as the men of Noah's day were wholly unprepared for the destruction that overtook them, so, the Master says, shall it be in the times when the Son of man shall come. But the coming of the Son of man is not a matter of future ages or the end of the world; it is a matter of daily and hourly realization. The Son of man comes as his people prepare for his coming and perceive him actually present in the life of our age. The Son of man comes when the conscience of the community is roused to the actual enormity of the liquor traffic, and the resolute purpose to put it out of existence. The Son of man comes as temperance becomes the law of the community.

The Master bade his disciples watch; only so could they know the certainty of the things concerning which he spoke. There are many people today who are untouched by the taint of the liquor traffic and uncursed by its blight. They are of the opinion that it is a natural part of the commercial and industrial life of the world; that though it does harm, yet the harm can probably not be helped. These people are not watching the signs of the times, or they would know that the mark of Cain is on the saloon, that the handwriting has appeared upon the wall, and that the hour of its doom is beginning to strike.

The Need of Vigilance.

The saloon itself is not resting in any fancied security. Its apologists and promoters are well aware of the precipice toward which they are being pushed. Their struggle is desperate; their anger against the forces of sobriety is bitter. They do not propose to be caught unaware. If the forces of temperance were as alert and vigilant as those of the saloon, there would be no need to caution them against the danger of sudden surprise. The words of the Master, "Be ready," need to be heeded by all those who lack the interest or the courage to take up the fight against this deadly foe of our land and fight till it is destroyed. What a shame it would be to have the Lord come in the way he is soon to appear—the overthrow of the saloon—and we have no part in the campaign. To such as stand in that danger his words have meaning: "Be ye also ready, for in an hour that ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

*International Sunday-school lesson for November 13, 1910. World's Temperance Lesson.—Matt. 34:22-51. Golden Text: "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation." Matt. 26:41. Memory verse 14.

—The area of country between the Mississippi river and the Rocky mountains is the great battle-field now between drunkenness and sobriety. In Iowa this fall, a vote is to be taken on the question of constitutional revision. In Nebraska the fight is for county option. In Oklahoma there is an organized campaign to take prohibition out of the constitution and legalize the sale of liquor. New Mexico is coming into the Union with prohibition so far as the Indian population is concerned, and a strong effort is being made to make it apply to everybody. Arizona is in the same position as New Mexico. It is a great fight, and it will be kept up until something definite is decided.

A Visit to the Foreign Field

Letter No. 3—From Honolulu to Brisbane

BY SECRETARY F. M. RAINS.

We have just reached Australia after a journey of about 9,000 miles. We have traveled over six thousand miles by water since leaving San Francisco, or twice the distance across the Atlantic. We have traveled second-class. This is good enough for a king; far better than we have at home. Many wealthy people use this service, bankers, lawyers, traveling men, etc. The expense is about one-half that of first-class. There were eight of our people on the good ship "Makura." It has been a great pleasure to travel with A. C. Rankine, one of our preachers of Adelaide, who has been in America for about a year. He has held a number of excellent meetings. He has been preaching for one church for twenty-one years.

Secretary G. B. Thompson, of the Seventh Day Adventists, has been one of our fellow passengers. He is visiting some of the missions of that people in foreign lands. That church has a membership of only about 83,000, and yet they raised over $300,000 for foreign missions in 1908, or about $3.75 per member. Their Sunday-schools gave $112,000 in 1909.

On the voyage we spent a day at Suva, the capital of the Fijian Islands. When I was a boy much was said about the horrors of cannibalism in these islands. Fifty years ago Fiji was probably the worst cannibal country in the world. Now it is as safe for residence or tourist as Indiana or Kansas. I am informed that an English lady in 1905 spent several months traveling through the mountain country in the interior of the islands far away from all white people, in perfect safety, though she was accompanied only by native guides, and could not even speak the language. I was told that the most timid might travel in any part of Fiji without a shadow of risk. One traveler, giving his recent experience among this people, says: "The gentle, old white-haired men, who welcomed us so kindly to their homes, and set their best before us, were once all fierce cannibals in their younger days, though now Christianized."

Change in Home Life.

The story of missionary triumphs in this land is quite generally known. Christian homes are found everywhere. What made this marvellous change? The same old Book that transformed Hawaii, that redeemed England and made America great. The living, reigning Christ was incarnated in the lives of this once pagan people. The story of the heroism and consecration of the early missionaries in Fiji should be repeated over and over to our children. That story reminds us of the present victories of Dr. Dye and others on the Congo and of Dr. Shelton and J. C Ogden in Tibet. While some of us were spending our days in criticising missions and missionary methods, other people went on and converted a nation.

A business man was on our ship who had just sold 1,200 American mules to the owners of sugar plantations in these islands. Most of these mules were probably from Missouri. And yet there are a few Missouri farmers still left who do not believe in foreign missions! The ship that carried us to the capital of Fiji carried also a large cargo of lumber from the state of Oregon. There would have been no market in these islands for mules and lumber if the missionary had not gone first.

Suva is one of the cleanest and prettiest little cities to be found. The Wesleyan Church, one of the first to enter the land, is strong. It has an important publishing house here. The Presbyterians also have an important work. One of the important buildings, just being completed, is a Carnegie library. Think of it! I had been told that Mr. Carnegie gave no money for libraries outside of the United States and Scotland Here is one exception at least. There may be many others.

This interesting group of islands was discovered by Tasman, it is said, as far back as 1643. They are now English territory. They were ceded as late as 1874. The United States ought to have had them. But at that time we lacked vision as a nation and besides we had other problems that were commanding our attention. There are two hundred islands in the group, eighty of which are inhabited. The population is about 130,000, of whom some 40,000 are from India. They are brought to the country by sugar barons to labor on their plantations. They usually come on a five year contract, but at the expiration of this period very few return to their native land and so become a permanent population. Here they find schools and churches for their families and they are quick to recognize their value.

It is believed that the Indian population will soon be more numerous than the native Fijian. This is strange and an altogether unexpected situation.

I am to begin at once a thirty days' campaign in the interest of foreign missions among the churches of Australia. The brethren expect me to speak about every day and some days two or three times. Of the campaign I will write about October 1st.

Brisbane, Australia.

Shall We Abandon Lotumbi?

A Challenge to the Heroic

BY DR. ROYAL J. DYE.

[Those who attended the Topeka Convention will remember Mrs. Dye's wonderful appeal for this station. After her burning words, the Chicago churches pledged $1,000. A friend in Akron, Ohio, had already given $1,000 and the Bethany, Nebr., church had added $250. A woman at the convention gave Mrs. Dye her gold watch for this work. $4,000 more is needed to hold and equip Lotumbi.—Editors.]

For two years the missionaries of Longa, Lascell Station, have been working the field for an hundred miles farther on as their outstations and work. Four years ago one of the earnest Christians of the Bolenge Church went home to this section and started the nucleus of a work which has been developed and fostered since then by Longa missionaries. About a year ago a plot was made of ground in a village which commanded all the populous back country. This village was Lotumbi. The plot was forwarded to the government and they in less than six months have given us this new site of Lotumbi as an appreciation of the medical services of your several missionaries in Africa. Drs. Widowson and Jaggard had opened the way for the Gospel message there by a series of operations and the people clamored for their own mission and doctor

The Village and Its People.

Lotumbi is a small village on the Momboyo branch of the Ruki branch of the main Congo. It is fully 75 miles from Longa which is at the mouth of the Momboyo near its junction with the Bossira River. Lotumbi lies near several small branches of the Momboyo and with its hinterland commands a population easily reached with our "Oregon" and by caravan of fully 400,000, while further on in the higher navigable waters of this river and its tributaries lies the rest of a half million people. The people are almost entirely Lonkundo, speaking or understanding it.

The people who sit in the valley and the shadow of death have seen a great light. The first messenger of the Gospel has come among them to live . They gathered in crowds to see him and the steamer which brougst these heroes of the Cross. Alone, far removed from other whites and farther removed from their brethren. Brother and Sister Herbert Smith have gone to carve not only an habitation out of the dark forest wilds, but to build there a church of the living God from material so remarkable as to make even these hardy workers shudder as they contemplate it in its raw state.

They are avowedly cannibals. They are wild savages. Their evangelists who preceded the missionaries have been called upon to stop bloody cannibalistic raids and intertribal feuds, which the white goverment official dare not attempt, but ask of them this service, saying they could do it better than he. Come into the school, a building they built themselves for the mission, and see the grown men who are struggling with such strange and wonderful things, as pencils, grotesque characters which they are told represent ideas and that finally they shall be able to read for themselves the wonderful message of God's love which has brought all this to them. Already they love their missionaries and they in turn have learned the secret of success in the work of his kingdom, for they find much to love in these dusky children of nature and of God. The little church numbers seventy-six. Eleven were baptized the first Lord's day of the new mission. People from across the river and from far in the swamps have come asking for their teachers and already the capacity and ability of the little church there is being taxed to supply them. When will we have our doctor is the cry? Will there be any more missionaries come to help our teachers now? Shall they always work here alone? Brethren these are hard questions. They are for you to answer. The society facing a year of special gifts finds itself short of funds for the general work and has sent us at the last moment when every thing else had been drained, a cablegram saying, "Lotumbi impossible!"

Strategic and Important Point.

What does this mean? Shall we have to abandon a place of such strategic and immediate importance? If we do it is all together likely we shall never get any more grants from this all too unwilling government. We shall lose not only our strong position as an aggressive mission but we shall lose in the eyes of the natives.

We do not believe that you realize this situation. We do not believe that you will make us retreat when we have finally gained a strong post. We have resolved to wait, even refusing to leave it at once, asking the society to give you a chance to make Lotumbi possible and permanent. Lowell says, "It is not what we give but what we share: the gift without the giver is bare." So share something with us who are willing, if need be, to work alone, denying ourselves many things even that we have felt we needed. Share not only the gift with us but share the work that that gift is to make possible and in joy we shall work together for the advancement of His Kingdom. Will you not send us another cablegram with "Rush Lotumbi?" What a stimulus to every one here that would mean. We have not dared to tell the native church that you are not going to back Lotumbi. For whenever there is a financial crisis they dig down into their pockets and get out something, plenty to tide over the crisis. Only last week the Bolenge Church gave a special offering of 1,637 brass rods to make possible a larger work. Will you not do the same? We trust in you. We depend upon you at home to hold the ropes and hold them good and strong. Give such a tug on those ropes now that we shall know you are there pulling along with us. May the Father bless you in this for His Kingdom's sake.

Bolenge, Africa.

The Fellowship and the Task

izing the American continent, while Jesus still prays, "Holy Father, keep them in Thy name, which Thou hast given me, that they may be one, even as we are . . . Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on me through their word, that they may all be one; even as Thou, Father, art in me and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou didst send me." The oneness of believers is essential to the saving of both America and the world. On the establishing of this republic, two thirds of its population were identified with Protestant or Roman Catholic churches, but after more than a century and a quarter, only one-third are now so classified and the two-thirds are unidentified with any church. There are hundreds of thousands in our great American cities without God and without hope, and of our states, in Colorado alone there are 130 towns, ranging from 160 to 1,000 in population with no Protestant Church of any kind and 100 of these without a Roman Catholic Church.

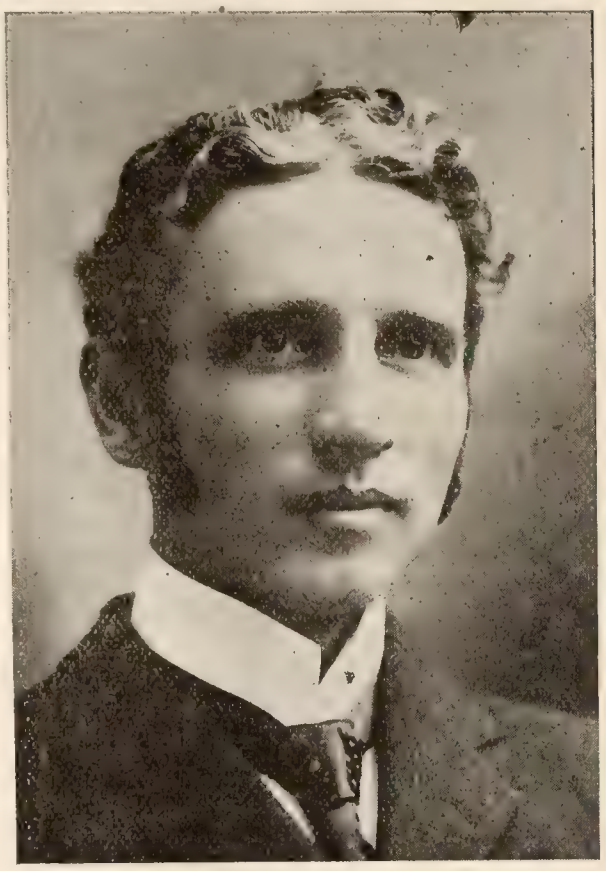
Providential Immigration.

It is no accident that the foreigners are coming here in great numbers, both from across the Atlantic and from across the Pacific. God is directing these streams of immigration and all the laws in America cannot shut down the gates. Come they will and come they must. They are swinging away from their national religions and whether they were Roman Catholics or pagans in their home land, the natural swing of the pendulum in this land is towards atheism or towards the extreme of Protestantism. This is our opportunity. No church in proximity to a foreign settlement has a right to claim the name of Christ and take an offering for foreign missions, unless it is willing to use as far as possible the opportunity that Christ has given for the evangelization of the foreigner at our doors. It is a shame on American Christianity that Protestant churches in our great cities are moving away from the foreign populations whom God is sending by thousands up to the very doors of Protestant churches, while the church officials are holding a council inside the building to devise some plan by which to get away from the God-sent throng. Well might the Jewish member of the French Assembly ask, "Has the church accepted Christianity?"

(Concluded next week.)

—A summary of the one hundred and sixth annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society tells of a record output of Bibles, New Testaments and Scripture Portions during 1909. The total issues were 6,620,024, and never before has the output reached a higher total than 5,900,000 copies.

The Brotherhood and the Laymen's Movement



The Heart of a Topeka Convention Address

BY GEORGE H. COMBS.

We hear a great deal said nowadays about "church work." What do we mean by it? We mean the activities of boards, circles, committees, societies, institutionalisms of a hundred kinds—mostly good and necessary, no doubt, but at best and at most only means by which we may advance the frontiers of His Kingdom.

Yet often our eyes are so filled with these intermediaries, our ears with the clash of machinery and the clamor of institutions that we forget the aim and end of it all. Church work! There is but one work of the church—to convert the world!

How often we hear the question, "What shall our Brotherhood do?" It is not an open question. The answer is already given.

Rev. George H. Combs.

There is but one thing it is called to do—convert the world!

Are we men alive to this great duty? Fear has been expressed of late in our zion of secretarial domination. The fear is groundless. If any of our secretaries shall outgrow his office, gently but firmly we shall remove the leathern encasements of his pedal extremities and remand him to the tender succulencies of green pastures, or in the Kansas language, which I like best, we shall pull off his shoes and turn him out to grass.

In a little while with the great preacher we shall be "behind closed doors." It is well away from the tumult and the shouting, alone, alone with God. May it be a memorable hour and pray God we get the enduement of power. But remember the power you get is power to be used. We cannot stay behind closed doors. Those closed doors open into world opportunities and the new radiance of a personal consecration must be lost in the greater radiance of service.

A Trinity of Blessings.

III. Thirdly: Its appeal is in its bestowal of a trinity of blessings, vitality, unity, spirituality.

It will give vitality. Do we not need it? Call the roll of many a Brotherhood's activities—educational propaganda, political reform, social betterment—and how many fail to answer, "Here." They are dead, quite dead! Skeletons in the Brotherhood closet? No, not in the closet, the closet is not large enough to hold them and they fill the assembly room. Skeletons to right of you, skeletons to left of you, skeletons in front of you fearsomely glistening. The Brotherhood lost in a valley of dry bones. Can these dry bones live? They can. Let them but be breathed upon by a passionate evangelism, touched by the hot breath of a great world purpose, and lo! that place of death and horror shall become all athrob with life and white with angel ministries.

It will give unity. Our Brotherhood activities too often lack relatedness, co-ordination. They are bound together by no central purpose, they are controlled by no regular aim. They are but heaps of fragments, huddles of dislocations lacking the system of cosmic things.

Unity a Necessity of Life.

But unity is a necessity of life. Rob the solar system of its unity, loose the bonds of the sun so that worlds might wander where they will and you have plunged it in chaos and the dark. But let that unity be inviolate—let planets feel as now the tug of the sun as it sweeps triumphantly through chasmed blackness and the blazing glories of the stars. Unity is a necessity of life up there; it is a necessity of life down here.

But above all it will give spirituality. This Brotherhood movement if it be a movement of God must be borne on the tides of the Spirit. It needs not so much width as depth; it needs not so much to be bigger as to be better. Let our cry be not more machinery but more might, not more method but more man. Lacking spirituality a Brotherhood will degenerate into a mere club. Now God does not want, the world does not need, a club. God wants and the world needs a spiritual force.

Would you rob the Brotherhood of all its normal, every-day activities, and plunge it into the gulf of an impractical pietism? We would do no such foolish thing. We plead only that these activities be deep-rooted in the spiritual that they may get the nourishment they need.

Consecrate the Flag.

A visitor to a certain church spying a battle flag there and appearing scandalized asked, "Isn't this a consecrated building?" "Yes," said the verger, "and this is a consecrated flag." Consecrate the flag! Consecrate your brotherhood activities!

Parades? Yes, but consecrated parades. Emblems, placards, banners? Yes, but ennobled by a divine aim. Educational, political, social betterment endeavors? Yes, but baptized in the blood of an earnest purpose.

After-dinner speeches with flashing fun and the blood-red wine of eloquence? Yes, but let the fun be the jollity of the mountain stream that laughs and sings yet leaps in its singing to join the far-off sea; let us have eloquence if you will but let it be the eloquence that stirs the soul to action—the eloquence of bayonet thrust and battle charge and fire and blood and tears—the eloquence that is born of love-purpose and the very music of passion—the eloquence that, scorning the bid for a petty applause, arouses the conscience and startles the soul and with its hot indictments brings to their feet a thousand men with their cry of anguish, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

Verle W. Blair, pastor at Payne Avenue Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., is preaching a series of Sunday morning sermons on the New Testament churches.

Ray Eldred spoke at West Side Church, Springfield, Ill., recently. Mr. Eldred is on a furlough from the missionary field, Bolenge, Africa, where he returns soon.

Arthur E. Mackey is in charge of the work at Lindsay, Calif. The various departments of the church are making good progress and larger quarters are needed.

The death of Mrs. Ira Drake has brought deep sorrow to the congregation of First Church, Seattle, Wash., where she was a devoted member.

A. C. McKeever has resigned after a three years' pastorate at Honolulu, H. I. Mr. McKeever was for a number of years pastor of First Church, Fresno, Calif.

A handsome new church was dedicated on Oct. 23, at Paris, Mo. The building which is commodious and complete, was erected at a cost of about $30,000. Frank W. Allen is pastor.

David Elsea, for the past five years pastor of the church at Creston, Ia., has accepted a call to First Church, Ottumwa. Ia. Mr. Elsea will remain at Creston until the close of the meetings being held by O. E. Hamilton.

Kern Park Church, Portland, Ore., has undergone much improvement recently, under the leadership of A. J. Adams. There have been a number of additions to the church membership.

University Place Church, Seattle, paid off its outstanding indebtedness on Oct. 1. The mortgage for $2,000 was burned and the church, free from debt, is now ready for a great work. T. J. Shuey is the minister.

Bruce Brown, pastor of Dean Avenue Church, Seattle, Wash., is preaching a series of sermons on "The Problem of Prayer" with the following subjects: Unanswered Prayer; How to Pray; The Model Prayer; Science and Prayer; Brieks without Straw.

F. F. Walters, formerly of Joplin, Mo., began his work at Independence, Mo., on Oct. 23, succeeding L. J. Marshall, who has conducted a successful pastorate during the past seven years. In the past fifty years this church has called only five pastors to its pulpit.

A. W. Fortune, pastor of Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, O., has been elected to th presidency of the Evangelical Alliance of that city. In addition to its usual activities this organization does much work in connection with the juvenile court.

W. A. Moore, of First Church, Tacoma, Wash., is one of the leaders in a movement to purify the existing social and civic conditions in that city. A publicity campaign is being carried on which bids fair to bring about many good results.

The church at Boyle Heights, Los Angeles, Calif., where Harvey Hazel ministers, burnt a note of $1,000 Oct. 16th, in the presence of a large congregation. This places them out of debt. They expect to build a new house next spring.

Central Church, Weatherford, Tex., will hold a rally and roll call on Nov. 6. Owen Livengood is the pastor there. In the weekly bulletin published by the church, Mr. Livengood has in each issue a short sermon touching on some vital topic of church life.

Owing to the Chapman-Alexander Simultaneous Evangelistic meetings now in progress, the Union Bible Class conducted by The Moody Bible Institute, will not be opened until November 12. New features have been added to this popular weekly Bible Class this fall.

There have been a number of additions to the Dean Avenue Church, Spokane, Wash., recently. Bruce Brown, the pastor there is conducting the work with success. A new location has been purchased and paid for, this being necessary to provide for the work in the rapidly growing departments.

The church at Liberty, Mo., having raised $600 for foreign missions this year, is now entitled to a life directorship in the Foreign Society, and the Sunday-school to a life membership. This church, of which Robert Graham Frank is pastor, is supporting Dr. Paul Wakefield in the field at Chao Hsieu. China.

Mr. Vachel Lindsay will deliver a series of lectures at Springfield, Ill., for the benefit of First Church, which is now erecting a new house of worship. Mr. Lindsay will discuss Springfield affairs from the Ruskin standpoint, particularly in regard to the architectural and artistic side of the new church. The congregation is meeting temporarily in Masonic Temple.

There were eleven accessions on Oct. 9 at Atchinson, Kan., where Z. E. Bates ministers W. F. Shearer, of Indiana, will begin a meeting there the latter part of November. The church and Sunday-school are holding a Harvest Home festival this week. Their expectation is to realize $1,000, which will be used in building a new church. Mr. Bates has just begun his fourth year with this congregation.

The congregation at Marion, Ind., with the pastor, J. P. Myers, are hard at work completing a fine $30,000 plant, which is to be modern in every particular. It is planned to have the dedicatory services, which will be conducted by George L. Snively, after the holidays, to be followed by a meeting for several weeks. This is a busy, growing congregation, and there is great promise of a fine work to be done there.

The Madison Avenue Church, Cleveland, O., will begin the erection of a handsome new edifice in the near future. The Sunday-school rooms, one of which will be a large auditorium, will be built first, at a cost of about $15,000, and as soon as this portion of the building is paid for, a large church auditorium will be built. Their building lot is 100x200 and beautifully located at West Boulevard and 101st street. F. C. Ford is pastor of this congregation, which now numbers 224.

The church at Alliance, O., is building a $5,000 parsonage.

E. A. Sears, formerly pastor at Pontiac, Ill., has removed to Winchester, Ill.

Leon V. Stiles, Sumter, S. C., can be secured for a meeting in January.

W. H. Shamon is in a meeting with the church at Chillicothe, Mo.

A new church, erected at a cost of $30,000, has been dedicated at Madisonville, Ky.

Irving Chenoweth becomes pastor of the 119th Street Church, New York City, where S. T. Willis has preached for many years.

First Church, Huntington, Ind., will be the meeting place for a Christian Endeavor convention, to begin on Thanksgiving Day.

Melvin Putnam, pastor of Christian Temple, Muscogee, Okla., is conducting a meeting at his church, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Kendall.

O. C. Bolman, pastor at Pekin, Ill., has as his sermon subject on Oct. 23, "The Question of the Ages: What Will You Do With Jesus?"

Garry L. Cook, superintendent of Sunday-school work in Indiana, conducted a Sunday-school institute at Bethany Church, Evansville, Ind.

Sunday, Nov. 6, is Non-absentee Day in the Massillon, O., Sunday-school, when every officer, teacher and scholar is expected to be present.

The evangelistic meetings at First Church, Springfield, Mo., conducted by Lawrence Wright, are well attended and interest in them is increasing.

J. H. Gilliland has closed his meeting at Cedar Rapids, Ia., and is now at Nevada, Mo. The meeting greatly strengthened the Cedar Rapids Church.

The church at Fulton, Mo., under the leadership of Truman E. Winter is receiving accessions continually. Work on their new church home was begun last week.

The young people of the church at Sigourney, Ia., are formally organized in an educational society, and frequently assist the pastor in the Sunday evening services.

The congregations of First and Central Churches, Joplin, Mo., have united, and as services will now be held in First Church, the Central Church property is ror sale.

Thirty of the delegates from Hutchinson, Kans., who attended the Topeka Convention, gave one-minute reports of convention impressions at First Church at the morning service, October 2'.

C. H. Hands, pastor of the church at Flanagan, Ill., recently preached a series of Sunday evening sermons on the Gospels. There have been a number of additions to the membership.

Second Church, Terre Haute, Ind., held an all-day meeting on Oct. 23. Dinner was served in the social rooms of the church after the morning service, followed by a praise service and social meeting.

H. G. Connelly of Ardmore, Okla., has resigned his pastorate there after more than three years' service. The congregation asked for his reconsideration, but it has been made final in order that a northern pulpit may be accepted.

Lowell C. McPherson, of Keuka Park, New York, is in a meeting at Parsons, Kan., assisted by his sister, Mrs. Nellie McPherson Moore, of Seattle, Wash. Mr. McPherson recently held a successful meeting in Pittsburg, Kan.

At the Lenox Avenue Christian Church, New York, Dr. W. Bayard Craig began an evening series of five lectures on "How We Got Our Bible." The subject on Sunday evening, "The Early Manuscripts," was illustrated with stereopticon.

Robert Sellers, of Elwood, Ind., has just closed a successful meeting at Providence Church in Johnson County, Ind. There were a number added to the membership and the spiritual life of the church was quickened. L. E. Miller conducted the singing. B. L. Allen is pastor of this church.

Walter E. Harmon, pastor at Sioux City, Ia., has organized a Teacher Training class, which is growing rapidly in membership and interest. The Sunday-school and prayer meeting services are being rejuvenated, and all the activities of the church are progressing.

W. S. Lowe, pastor of Central Church, Kansas City, Kan., in a sermon addressed particularly to the young men of the congregation, spoke on "Get-rich-quick" evils, and its attendant evils, comparing the sterling characteristics of our forefathers with the lack of responsibility of many of the present generation.

The church at Tolleston, Ind., erected in a day through the leadership of its pastor, Mrs. Martha S. Trimble, was paid for at a recent service, $1,000 being donated in a few minutes. This church, which started with seven members, is now conducting a campaign to increase the membership to 100.

Memorial Church, Rock Island, Ill., has an enthusiastic Brotherhood. At one of their recent meetings, a delegation from the Men's Club of First Church, Davenport, Iowa, headed by S. M. Perkins, pastor of the church attended, an interesting meeting was enjoyed. A talk was given by a local editor on the commission form of government, and other civic questions. E. T. McFarland, the pastor, also gave a talk on the objects of the Brotherhood.

J. H. O. Smith, of First Church, Oklahoma City, Okla., is working in conjunction with the judge of the police court and a local physician to help a number of habitues of the court room who are victims of the drink habit. The physician has volunteered to administer a whisky cure free to any one whom the judge "sentences" to a term in the liquor sanitarium. When the cure has been effected, Mr. Smith will take the case in charge and help him to find work and to lead a sober and industrious life.

Guy W. Sarvis gave his illustrated lecture on Africa at the church at Beatrice, Neb., on October 17. This church, under the efficient leadership of J. E. Davis, has grown to be one of the strongest in the central west. Mr. Sarvis' lecture was given under the auspices of the men of the church and was a success in every way, in spite of the grand opera the same evening. The lecture combines educational interest, narrative vividness, and thoughtful deduction in a most happy fashion, and the people were delighted with it.

In order to keep in touch with the large congregation of University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., Charles S. Medbury has divided it into fifteen neighborhoods. Adjoining blocks form one neighborhood, the division being so made that in each company there is not less than eighty or more than 150. Each company is effectively organized, with leader, assistant leader, and messengers. Fifteen homes in the various sections were opened on a recent evening. This is an excellent way to bring about a closer feeling of fellowship in a large congregation, where the entire membership cannot frequently come together socially.

Round About Niagara

The First Church, Tonawanda, held a reception for the new pastor, Frank A. Higgins and wife, Thursday evening, October 20.

The District C. W. B. M. Convention of Western New York will be held at Clarence, Wednesday, October 26.

Leslie M. Moody, formerly of Meadville, Pa., has become the pastor at Williamsville.

W. C. Prewitt, Niagara Falls, will entertain the International Interdenominational Ministerial Association at the Imperial Hotel ings at the Christian Tabernacle, North Monday, October 31.

Arthur Braden will begin a series of meet- Tonawanda, October 30.

The New York State Board at its last meeting appointed R. H. Miller, B. S. Ferrall and V. W. Blair, a permanent Program Committee for the Jubilee Convention next year. The convention will occupy a week and it is the intention of the committee to provide a program which will make an impression upon Buffalo.

Obituary

McKNIGHT.

After an illness of almost a year Mrs. E. Ballie McKnight passed away at her home in Los Angeles on Sept. 26, 1910. Her suffering had been intense, but through all the long months borne with a patience that revealed a character truly Christlike. She was born in Girard, Ill., May 29, 1868, and throughout her life had always lived among Christion influences. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Metcalf, were prominent in the local church work and in the state work, too. Her education was completed at a Christian college, Eureka. On Dec. 17, 1889, she was married to Jesse P. McKnight, now one of our prominent ministers. Not strange then, that throughout her life her chief interest centered in the church and its work.

As a bride she went to Lynnville, Ill., her husband's first pastorate; and after leaving there, they two have worked together at Harrison, Ill.; Central Church, Peoria, Ill.; Oskaloosa, Iowa, and ever since its organization, at the Magnolia Ave. Church, Los Angeles. If being in perfect sympathy with his every effort, and proving herself the inspiration of her husband's work in the ministry are to be the measure of the ideal wife, then surely none who knew them could deny her that tribute. Besides her husband, she leaves a son, Harold, a student at Stanford University, and a daughter, Geraldine, a high school girl of Los Angeles. One sister and four brothers survive her also. On September 28, funeral services were conducted by the writer, assisted by J. N. Smith, pastor of the East Los Angeles Christian Church. The very presence of the many hundreds of people who thronged the church was in itself a tribute to her memory. About twenty-five of the ministers from our nearby churches attended in a body. Flowers in such profusion as is seldom seen, and the many kindly expressions on every hand, gave evidence of the heartfelt sympathy of countless friends whose lives she had touched. In her life every member of the congregation delighted to do her honor; not one but was her friend. To a degree rarely found, unselfishness marked her life, even in the days of greatest pain. Upon the church life has been left indelibly the impress of her sweet spirit. The memory of her life will be cherished by all who knew her as a rich heritage indeed.

J. LESLIE LOBINGIER.

Observations in Brief

Dolliver's Fight for Principle.

There were abler men in the Senate than Jonathan P. Dolliver, of Iowa, but none truer to his principles. He was a brilliant orator. He was a dangerous debater to face. He was a tremendous worker, and 20 years' experience in Congress had ripened his talents and enriched his knowledge of legislation. But none of these qualifications had contributed so much to the respect and honor in which he was popularly held as his courage and honesty in standing for ideas and policies which the recognized leaders of his party were determined to defeat at any cost. The consumer had few trustworthy friends in Congress during the revision of the tariff. From the start those few were destined to be on the losing side. But even when it was evident that Senator Aldrich would succeed in driving his tariff through the Senate with the aid of the organized forces of plutocracy and privilege, Senator Dolliver only increased his efforts as the champion of fair dealing—New York World.

High Tariff, High Prices.

American defenders of high tariff who contend that the Aldrich-Taft law is not to blame for the higher cost of living should take a look at other countries. In Austria, for example, a mob of some 200,000 recently made a demonstraton of protest against the exorbitant cost of meat. In Berlin similar riots are attributed by Reuter to the same cause. Both these countries are highly "protected," like the United States. Rich tariff barons tax the poor consumer for their own personal profit. Both countries suffer from the high cost of living. It is perfectly plain that high tariff means high prices. There is no defense for any system that provides a privileged class of society, with special guaranteed profits at the expense of the masses.—Chicago Journal.

A Plea for the South.

In five years time the United States has lost 350,000 of her best citizens to Canada—residents, principally, of the Central West, carrying with them intelligence, experience and money into a foreign country, the lure of which is but ephemeral, while the vast untenanted acres of the United States are open to them. If they must leave at all, let them go, not to an alien north, where the winters are long and unproductive, and the summer heat nearly as torrid as at the equator, but to the South, where land is cheap and soil is rich and cultivable twelve months of the year; where the climate is equitable and the health is equal to if not better than in any given section of the United States—President M. B. Trezevant of Southern Commercial Secretaries Association.

Curb the Money Power.

The power of money has become a menace to established American institutions. It can be curbed only as is now being attempted in Pennsylvania, by putting the liberal spenders on the carpet and making them prove that their vast campaign contributions have been legitimately expended, or suffer the consequences. There are clauses in the Pennsylvania direct primary act which specify clearly the lawful limits in which money may be spent by candidates.—Fall River Herald.

Express Companies Must Come to Time.

The great public is "insurging." It is tired of melon-cutting, stock-watering, extortion and fancy-free practices on the part of common carriers in the express business. Scrutiny, publicity, regulation will not stop with railroads. The express companies will be subjected to proper control along with all other common carriers. There will be no "confiscation," and no sane man has proposed it, but there will be reason and measure in the express rates and charges.—Chicago Record-Herald.

Issues Before the Supreme Court.

When the United States Supreme Court assembled last week only six members were there, the others, including the Chief Justice, having been removed by death. Shortly afterward, however, Governor Hughes, recently appointed, was sworn in. It will soon be incumbent upon the president to appoint a new member and a chief justice. Seldom has the court been faced with a docket containing so many important and far-reaching issues as that of the session just opened. The boycott case, employers' liability, the trust cases, the corporation tax and other cases, involving state's right issues, are among the important cases which vitally affect the industrial and commercial structure of the nation.

The International Road Association.

Although the United States has the most extensive system of roads in the world, it has been one of the three slowest nations to join the International Road Association now formally adhered to by twenty-six governments. Italy and England are the only other large countries which have not joined. The nations of Europe have gone a long way ahead of the United States in road work, particularly in the matter of administration and road maintenance, and experts say that for this reason this country would benefit immensely in the advantage of collaboration made possible by membership in the international congress. An effort is being made to have the United States enrolled as a member.

A Civil War Incident Recalled.

A pathetic little banquet was held at the Wellington hotel, in Chicago, one night last week. There were only eight men at the table, all that remain of a once famous band. Colonel Elmer E. Ellsworth was the first Union officer killed in the Civil War. He was commander of the United States Zouave Cadets, who went into the war 120 strong. These eight men are the only survivors. This was probably their last meeting. The youngest is now 68 and the eldest 81 years old. This was their fiftieth reunion, and at its close they departed for their homes in various parts of the country. Colonel Ellsworth was but 24 at the time he was killed.

Mystery of the Coppers.

In spite of the fact that the Philadelphia mint coined 146,000,000 pennies last year and many other millions in years before, the mystery of where the little coppers go still is unsolved, and Director of the Mint, George E. Roberts, estimates the big plant will make another 100,000,000 this year. Pennies, more so than any other sort of coin, disappear from circulation very mysteriously. The government does not mind coining them, however, for it includes a fine profit. A pound of copper, costing now about 13 cents, will make a dollar in pennies.

Rainier of the Last Frontier

As for reasons, why, God He knows
"Oh! ain't you coming along with me
To chase them Filipeenos
Go get your gun
An' join the fun
He knows, He knows."

The song betrayed the fact that the soldier was swinging back and forth on a short beat. Running a guard who has a loaded gun is a feat necessitating so much ginger that nothing short of a camera can catch it. It's either done or undone in the blink of a second. Slipping off his shoes, Rainier flashed across the gang plank and was carelessly contemplating the dock between the time that the soldier swung past the head of the gangway and his return. To be reasonably exact, to swing the beat took four seconds longer than for Clark to make his change of base. A squeak of the gangway, a slip, a backward glance of the sentry, would have undone him, and even now, as the man turned back and saw the figure of the correspondent dimly showing at his very side, the song died abruptly and Rainier felt suspicious eyes boring into his back.

But he was apparently unwilling to admit that any man could skim into the "Hyson" under his very nose, and he asked no embarrassing question. A moment later he went back to his song.

"Oh ain't you coming along with me?"

With a grin Rainier slipped down the nearest hatch.

CHAPTER II.

"Q. M. D."

Rainier had slipped rather than climbed down the abrupt ladder leading below.

He found himself between two long rows of canvas hammocks supported in tiers of three by steel frames. Lonely incandescents along the deck beams above showed at a glance that he was in the sleeping quarters of either soldiers or Q. M. D. civilian employes.

But every berth was empty and the only sign of life was a man seated on a locker close under an electric a half-dozen berth lengths forward.

It was no time to hesitate, and Rainier made directly toward him, noticing, as he did so, that the man was looking up from a piece of sewing and was holding his needle awkwardly free from the cloth. The upturned face was the weather-carved Rocky Mountain type, gaunt, leathery, nonchalant. There was the hospitable kindliness of the frontier in the eyes.

"One of us?" came a voice, high pitched and strong.

"Wish I were," answered Rainier heartily. The homely face turned up to him with its faded light mustache tinged with grey, and its kindly blue eyes—so blue that even the incandescents could not make their color uncertain—had won his confidence. He had planned to cast himself on the mercy of the captain, but it was risky business. Here, however, was a man who had felt the free air of the range. A cowman has more imagination than a bucko mate or the captain of a chartered "lime-juicer."

Therefore he explained his presence frankly while the listening cowman resumed work on his patched trousers. Feet were tramping busily on the deck above their heads as he finished. Evidently the "Hyson" was spending its last five minutes in Seattle.

"I'm afraid that they will put in at Port Townsend on the way down the San Juan de Fuca Strait and land me there unless you can stow me away for a brace of days. And we're not clear of Seattle as yet."

As if in answer to his fears, a pair of official legs began to come down out of the dark night at the hatchway behind him. A second more disclosed a bearded and athletic ship's officer who came along the deck unhesitatingly and tapped Rainier on the shoulder.

"I bean watching you from the bridge, me lad. You cawn run a guard, but you cawn't beat a sailor's heye. Now climb out on the dock. This 'ere hisn't no moonlight hexcursion for a shoal o' bloody dudes. Get a move honto you."

For an instant Rainier searched the face of the newcomer. But the type was hopeless. No argument would avail and the man was too stolid for money to talk effectively, for in this case it must also talk quickly. Even under so brief a scrutiny the face of the officer had grown grim and his heavy hand tightened on Rainier's shoulder.

Only a bluff would answer and it would have to be a good one.

"I'm with the packers' outfit," he said, outwardly calm but fearfully conscious that his clean shave, his neat suit and his natty suit-case damned his pretension.

The officer laughed with unpleasant shortness,

"Climb out hon the dock or we'll 'ave to hoffer you a 'and," he said briefly.

As he spoke, the noise overhead increased. Even in his desperation Rainier recognized a scraping sound with a leap of hope. The gangway was being pulled in.

The seated man had continued his sewing, but here suspended his work and calmly interposed a surprising sentence.

"Han's off, King Edward," he said, as gently as the noise overhead would permit. "This feller is my best man. He sure looks the dude part, but he's the best hoss handler on this ship. Sabe?"

The officer's hand fell from Rainier's shoulder. But he stood his ground.

"Hi saw 'im run the guard with me own hize," he said, but the threat had left his voice.

Here the new-found advocate arose, the neglected trousers slapping on the floor. Lowering his head slightly and pointing an accusing fore-finger at the ship's officer he said with much more feeling than the occasion seemed to warrant:

"Run the guard? Why not? If you'd had a girl to kiss over in the town an' felt all busted up an' broken out over leaving her for some other fellow to cop while you was gone fur away, an' yore eyes was filled with tears, would you hev wanted some cheap little soger boy to hold you up and find out yore condition an' make a joke of you fer the hull trip? He hid his feelings. He's got delicacy. A blanked lot more than some of these thick-headed walrus hided gin-fizzlin' tea-and-toast Britishers who would rush right into his tenderest feelings! Why' here's one of my best hands leaving a real American dazzler behind him, not to see her fer months—"

At this point even English devotion to duty was insufficient to hold the officer further under fire. Feeling that in some way he was being bunkoed he nevertheless turned on his heel and cursed his way up the hatch and out of sight.

Behind him he left a mirthful pair of Americans warmly clasping each other's hands.

Rainier tried to get rid of some of his thankfulness.

"No thanks due," said the packer smilingly. "We got a lot of bronks an' 'shave-tails' down below. I reckon you'll have to lend a hand with 'em ef you caint make it up with the captain after we pass Flattery."

"I'm yours. I've done almost everything except work on a horse transport but I can learn if you will go easy with me for a day or so."

The huge whistle of the "Hyson" here gave a vast preliminary splutter, cleared it's throat, broke into a bray that made the boat tremble, and rose hoarse over the water front in final warning.

Both men waited for it to die away.

"What's yore handle, friend?" queried the older man.

"Rainier. Clark Rainier."

"Same as The Mountain?"

Yes. Same family." laughed Rainier. "And your name, sir?"

"Benson. Alaska Benson is what the outfit calls me," returned the packer. "We air both shorely ambitious in the name line."

Once more their hands met; two strong men of the last frontier. A moment later Rainier was directed to an unoccupied bunk and dumped out the contents of his suit-case in preparation for his first night of the long journey.

In five minutes he was fixed for slumber and knew the wild gladness of the born adventurer as he felt the vibration of the starting engines and realized the die to be cast for good or evil.

His last conscious moment brought the knowledge that other men of the packer's "outfit" were tumbling into bunks all about him with muttered jokes and sotto oaths, and that Alaska had thrown a second heavy horse-blanket over him and snapped out the bulb over his head. And so with the sturdy thud-thud of the engines rocking him to sleep, our hero went out over the swell of Juan de Fuca into the vast mystery of the sovereign Pacific.

The 1911 Congress in Kansas City

The 1911 Congress of the Disciples of Christ will be held in Kansas City, Missouri, April 18-20. This is the week after Easter and has been found a most convenient time for ministers to assemble. The Linwood Boulevard Christian Church entertains the Congress in their beautiful new place of worship. Burris A. Jenkins is the pastor. The committee desires to thank the other churches which have sent invitations, but after due deliberation it has been thought best to accept the invitation to Kansas City. The program will be published soon. We believe the Congress fills a large place in the life of the Brotherhood and that the next meeting should be our best. C. H. Winders, Indianapolis, is president, R. H. Crossfield, Lexington, Kentucky, E. E. Faris, N. Waco, Texas, B. A. Abbott, St. Louis, are vice-presidents.

JOSEPH C. TODD,
Bloomington, Ind. Secretary-Treasurer.

American Mission Notes

We are now in the midst of the campaign for the offering to be taken this month. Various communications have been sent and the replies have been most encouraging. Every one of the 8,000 Bible-schools in America can take and ought to take some offering on or near November 20. Our slogan is, "Some offering from every school, a generous one from those who gave in 1909, and a total contribution of $30,000."

Whitney Ave., Wash. D. C.—"Our meeting here is starting off in fine style with thirty-six responses the first thirteen days. We have great audiences and we are looking for a great ingathering." H. F. LUTZ.

R. E. McCorkle reports a church organized at Pine Grove, Leak Co., Miss., with sixty-five members.

C. F. Swander, Cor. Sec., Oregon, reports ninety-seven additions to the church, of which number forty-seven were by baptism.

For the first quarter of their missionary year, Texas reports 897 accessions to the chuches in the state, of which number 420 were by baptism.

Wisconsin's secretary reports a church organized at Sabin, Wis., with sixty-five members, twenty-four of whom were recently baptized.

The first Lord's day in this month we held one of the best Bible-school rallies that I have ever attended. It is the beginning of greater things. In November we begin a meeting with home forces. We are hoping and working for a great work this year.

Pensacola, Fla. THOS. LENNOX.

We have a campaign on here to secure 100 persons to guarantee a sum of $25 each to employ a strong pastor and hold an evangelistic meeting of large proportions at Cheney in the early future, because of the State Normal School of 600 students. It is the most important work in East Washington now. J. A. PINE.

N. A. Davis, Vancouver, B. C., says: "During this year our work has been put upon a more permanent basis in this great port of entrance for the Northwest. We now have a membership of seventy-six in the church and 114 in the Bible-school. These raised a total of $1,235.75. During the year there were twenty-one accessions to the church." Mr.

Davis reports that the lack of a suitable house in which to meet is a great hindrance to the work. "Without this, retrogression is inevitable. I hope, though hard as the problem seems, we may be able to solve it, and I believe that there is reason to expect that we will be able to build at an early date. There are many disciples in this city, but they will not come into the dancing hall where our meetings are held. This cause will not be moved forward in a day. There is no better outlook in the world when we once get a building."

E. L. Frazier, St. Petersburg, Fla., writes: "The work prospers. Sunday-schools and audiences more than doubled since May 1. We are building. Will have the best equipment in the city. Building tabernacle of concrete blocks, 50 x 75 feet, with basement for Sunday-school. Cost of tabernacle $3,500. Sold church property for $2,600. We hope to be self-supporting after another year. The coming year will be our hard year with the tabernacle to pay for. Please keep up your present support for one year more. The tabernacle is a permanent building. Walls may be built higher for church proper in future.

All offerings for American missions should be sent to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

From the Foreign Society

The last word received from Mr. Rains is dated Adelaide, South Australia, September 24. He reports that he has been having a great time in Australia. Large and enthusiastic crowds greeted him everywhere. The brethren could not be more kind or thoughtful. They are hospitality itself. The Federal Conference was held in Adelaide and was the most successful in the history of our people in that part of the world. The Foreign Missionary offerings amounted to more than $13,000. This is very creditable in view of the fact that the membership numbers only 20,000. Mr. Rains expected to leave Perth, West Australia, October 3, for Colombo, India. He expected to reach Colombo on October 12.

James C. Ogden reports five baptisms in Tibet. These are the first fruits of what is believed will be a glorious harvest. The American minister wired Dr. Shelton to know if the necessary permission to build had been given. The obstacle appears to have been taken out of the way.

Word was received from Miss Bertha Clawson at Honolulu. The letter was dated October 11. There were forty missionaries on board. Most of these were Baptists.

Mrs. George W. Brown and Miss Stella Franklin reached Naples September 29. They found some cholera in Naples. From Naples they propose to hurry on to India.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon reports seventeen baptisms for the month, 1,267 treatments, eighteen surgical operations, fifty-four professional visits in Laoag, and twenty-two to outside towns. At the request of the missionaries the Provincial Goverment has appropriated $500 to help the very poor in Laoag.

R. A. McCorkle reports eight baptisms in the Osaka District. One of these was at Gose, two at Tennoji, and five at Kizugawa.

W. H. Erskine reports that land has been bought for the kindergarten at Akita, Japan. He has contracted with a Japanese carpenter to put up a building, costing $2,000. The building is to be finished by the first of December.

A. F. Hensey and wife arrived at Matadi, on the Congo, September 12. They took the train to Stanley Pool and the first boat from Stanley Pool to Bolenge.

The following is the way our Congo missionaries epitomize the wonderful results of the work there: Five baptized at Lotumbi April 17, 1910. Twelve baptized at Longa June 26, 1910. Forty baptized at Bolenge July 10, 1910. Fifteen baptized at Longa April 10, 1910. Eleven baptized at Lotumbi June 19, 1910. Eighty-eight baptized at Bonyeka, April 10, 1910. Ninety-nine baptized at Bonyeka July 27, 1910. Ninety-one evangelists are at the front. There are nineteen chapels where regular services are held. There are fifty-seven places where meetings are held regularly. Since the first of October, 1909, four hundred and twenty have been baptized. The fifty-seven Sunday-schools have a total enrollment of twenty nine hundred. There are nine Endeavor societies with a total membership of thirteen hundred and twenty-eight. The entire offering of the native Christians during the past year is forty-four thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven brass rods; other offerings were given making the total of sixty-one thousand two hundred and thirty-seven brass rods; or six hundred and twelve dollars and thirty-seven cents.

The deficit of $39,000 reported by the Foreign Society at Topeka seems to have been more of a stimulus than a discouragement. The realization that the work is growing much faster than the regular income, is going to stir our people to larger things. The missionaries have planted the seed in many stubborn fields. We have waited and prayed for the harvest. God is answering the prayers these days. Many are being baptized. A host of trained evangelists and workers are going forth from the schools in heathen lands.

New out-stations, more patients for the medical missionaries, and expansion of the work on every hand is a distinct challenge to the supporters of the work at home. The Topeka Convention set the standard at $500,000 for foreign missions this year. That is an average of a little less than fifty cents per member. We can do it if we will.

There has just come to the offices of the Foreign Society a copy of the Lokundo grammar. This is by Mrs. Royal J. Dye and has been printed on the mission press at Bolenge, Africa. It is a very neat little book of 142 pages, and has been printed under the direction of Charles P. Hedges at Bolenge. When it is remembered that the native people had no written language at all when our missionaries went to the Congo, one cannot but marvel at the completion of this grammar. The workers express their appreciation in the preface of the little book in the following words: "Mrs. Dye has put much labor on it when she should have been resting, and we, who shall use this book, and all who are praying for the evangelization of the people, are very thankful to her for her untiring work."

Bethany Graded
Sunday School Lessons
INTERNATIONAL COURSE - - - INTERDENOMINATIONAL HELPS

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

The new graded Sunday-school lessons provided by the International Lesson Committee constitute the

in a half century of Sunday-school progress. The Bethany Graded Lesson Helps for teachers and pupils are the acme of excellence in Sunday-school supplies. The Teacher's Helps are planned so that no one need fear to undertake the teaching of the lesson because of lack of special training.

The publishing houses of sixteen denominations have united to produce a non-sectarian and scientific system of religious instruction. About $200,000 was spent last year in producing these lessons. No such elaborate and artistic helps have ever been offered to the Sunday-schools as this Interdenominational series.

The writers of these lessons are the most expert in the Sunday-school world. They are not chosen because of their denominational connection, but because they are specialists in the teaching of the word of God and possess the fine art of inspiring other teachers. The literature is fascinating to teacher and pupil.

The Bethany Lessons afford the Sunday-schools of the Disciples a signal opportunity for

PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNION

Both as an expression of unity and as a factor making for deeper unity this enterprise is more significant than any other event in recent church history. The lessons are not prepared in a sectarian spirit, nor for a sectarian purpose, yet the editor is perfectly free to assert his convictions in any point of doctrine vital to him or his constituency. Ample provision is made for teaching the history and plea of the Disciples and for telling the story of Disciple missionary heroes. Certain of the courses will be written by Disciple authors.

YOU CANNOT BE AMONG THE FIRST

To exchange the Uniform for the Graded Lessons, for already thousands of schools are ahead of you—8,000 in the Methodist Church alone, 4,000 in the Presbyterian, and many thousands more, in the sixteen denominations that have made the forward step, with Disciples' Schools in rapidly increasing numbers.

BUT DO NOT BE AMONG THE LAST!

These Lessons may be begun at any time. October 2 is the beginning of the year. Send immediately for samples, prices and order blank.

Facts and Opinions

—Writing from Mukden, a correspondent of the North China Daily News says: "The opium poppy now seems to be extinct throughout the whole of Manchuria, unless, as rumor has it, certain patches may be found in the Yenchiting region, where in remote mountain valleys, some is said to be still grown, and is easily smuggled into Korea and Vladivostok, to which many old and confirmed gamblers and opium smokers resort. One hopes that Japan will soon see her way to handle the Chinese opium sots in Korea, with a strong hand and also Russia will wake up to the fact that her many thousands of Chinese residents would be much better if she were more severe with the opium smokers and chronic gamblers."

—The growing commercial interdependence of oriental countries, as against their former dependence upon the Occident, is illustrated by the latest figures of the foreign commerce of China, which have just reached the bureau of statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor. The statement, an official report of the Chinese government, shows large increase in that nation's imports from oriental countries and Russia, while in most cases the imports from occidental countries show a decline. The largest actual gains in the imports into China are in merchandise coming from India, Japan, Russia, French Indo-China and Singapore. The figures show a larger fall in the imports from the United States than from any other of the important countries of the world. These imports fell from 41,245,704 haikwan taels in 1908 to 32,606,549 taels in 1909. The average value of the haikwan tael was in 1909 about 63 cents and in 1908 65 cents.

—Prof. Edward A. Ross, head of the department of sociology at the University of Wisconsin, who has returned to Madison from a seven months' visit in the Orient, studying sociological conditions, predicts that a change in our future immigration laws will be necessary to avoid international complications with the Japanese and Chinese, particularly the former. He says that the Japanese were not cordial to Americans, much to his surprise and there will be trouble ahead if we exclude the Japanese from this country and let in the other nations.

Prof. Ross said that he thought another war between Russia and Japan was inevitable. "I see this result from the building operations that are now being carried on by the Russian government on the Trans-Siberian railroad. There can be no doubt that these operations are military in character The entire route is being double tracked at an enormous expenditure and the traffic necessities at the present time do not warrant it."

"The Chinese," he said, "are far ahead of the government. It is not yet settled whether China will have a peaceful evolution through western civilization or whether there will be great commotion. It depends essentially upon the degree of efficiency of the prince regent. In some of the provinces foot binding is still in vogue. The Chinese are friendly toward Americans."

—According to a report issued by two Russian surgeons appointed to investigate the matter, there are more than 200,000 prisoners in Russian prisons that have accommodations for only 120,000. In the year covered by the report, 172,798 cases of sickness were treated in the prison hospitals, including 2,417 of scurvy, 6,156 of tuberculosis, and 16,000 of typhus, or "jail fever." A great deal of the sickness is attributd to poor ventilation. These facts, which are not at all creditable to the Russian government, are published in the official organ of the Russian prison department.

—The Presbyterian synod of Illinois will set aside $100,000 for the endowment of a Presbyterian training school in Chicago. An equal sum for the furtherance of religious work at the University of Illinois is already provided. At the next Presbyterian general assembly it will be recommended that provision be made for maintenance of teachers and professors in the church colleges of the state who have reached an advanced age.

you do not have to work close to the stove, which is usually far from the window. You can work where you wish, and be warm. You can work on dull winter days in the full light near the window, without being chilled to the bone.

The Perfection Oil Heater quickly gives heat, and with one filling of the font burns steadily for nine hours, without smoke or smell. An indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font. The filler-cap, put in like a cork in a bottle, is attached by a chain. This heater has a cool handle and a damper top.

The Perfection Oil Heater has an automatic-locking flame spreader, which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back, so the wick can be quickly cleaned. The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged and can be unscrewed in an instant for rewicking. The Perfection Oil Heater is finished in japan or nickel, is strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

A Practicable Campaign for Unity

It is apparent that many of our people are seriously studying the question of unity. They are trying to find new ways for the application of effective effort to the difficult situation which confronts the American churches at the present time.

There are many people who live in large cities who are almost unaware that sectarianism is a fatal and excuseless hindrance to the work of moral and spiritual uplift.

Probably in cities the spirit of disunion is far less evident than in small communities. The impact of evil is so tremendous in great cities that the forces of good order and decency are driven together by the pressure of circumstances.

But in the small town and village this is not true. There the personal element has large opportunity to express itself. And the small prejudices and partisanships of life become more conspicuous in the work of the church.

It is to this situation that the following letter from one of our men of experience and wisdom addresses itself:

> The religious condition and needs of the village churches are so great that I venture to send a line, asking your judgment.
> In the villages where we have churches we are making no great headway toward practical unity, but we are at least represented.
> But, it seems to me, the villages having from three to six or seven churches, and where we have no church, furnish a fine field for the delivery of the unity message and for the bringing about of practical Christian unity. There are hundreds of villages that can support only one church, yet they are struggling to support a number. In many of them the best men are outside and will not come in under present conditions, unreasonable though they may seem to the churches and ministers. Sooner or later there will not be even one church in many of these towns.
> It seems to me we have a fine opportunity offered to us by these conditions, and we ought to take advantage of it by placing a man of the right spirit and proper training in the field to go into these villages, deliver the message as it should be delivered, hold conferences with ministers and members, and lead a movement for unity. He would need to be very clear in message and action, be content to get himself misunderstood often, bear all things for the purpose that takes him to the town, and all that; but to have the root of the matter in him to the degree that nothing would be able to divert him.
> It would, of course, take many efforts and much time, grace and patience, but one problem worked out would give the movement and the man a great impulse, and another village could be approached. I am sorry to say the great obstacle would be the preachers themselves.
> I feel that something of this character should be brought before our people, and I would like to have your judgment.
> J. Fred Jones.

It seems to us that the suggestions offered in this letter are of very great value. Too frequently the intrusion of a new church into a small community is a disaster rather than a benediction.

Of course each of the denominations is intent upon the spread of its own propaganda. Wherever there is a town of any notable size, it appears to the denominational leaders necessary that they should plant a church in that place.

The Disciples are not exempt from this natural ambition. Our state secretaries and evangelists are so intent upon planting churches in fields where we have none already that they do not always stop to question whether those fields are sufficiently churched already, and whether the coming of a new congregation might not seriously weaken the forces of Christianity in the place.

We have long believed that the practice of our state boards in many instances was governed less by the consideration for the needs of the kingdom of God at large than the possibilities of denominational prestige in the places within their reach.

But the suggestion of the letter which we have printed above is in every way admirable. The selection of men who would interpret the spirit of Christian unity to all the churches, without the thought of planting another organization where there are already enough, would go further to make the Disciples understood among the churches around us than anything else we could do.

It would prove beyond question the fact that we are not seeking to build up a denominational recruiting station in the places visited, but rather to spread the spirit of good will and union among all Christians.

It has recently been suggested that we have need of a literary bureau to circulate suitable statements on the theme of Christian unity among our brethren of the other churches. This is an excellent suggestion.

But the plan suggested above is even more practicable. It carries the message in a personal and sympathetic way, and would compel the attention of people who might never be interested in tracts and documents.

We have suggested from time to time in the columns of The Christian Century the value of lectureships and institutes of Christian unity in just as many places as we could reach.

The Unitarians have a large fund which they devote to lectureships in interpretation of the principles of Unitarianism in different parts of the country. They have also an extensive literary bureau that furnishes books and pamphlets gratis to all who will apply for them.

We believe that both of these methods would be effective if employed by the Disciples, and we hope that the recently formed Council on Christian Unity will make trial of the value of such plans at the very earliest date.

But even more significant would be such a movement as our correspondent suggests. The lectureships and institutes will naturally fall to the larger places where an adequate hearing can be secured. The literature will probably go to individuals who are sufficiently interested to apply for it.

But the plan here contemplated is that of a missionary who goes about from place to place with no purpose to form local churches, but only intent upon gathering the people irrespective of their religious affiliations and setting before them the ideals and obligations of Christian unity.

As our correspondent says, it would require a man of tact and grace to do this. But many such we have, and the influence of a campaign of this kind would be beyond estimate in its value.

Why will not one of our State Boards make experiment of just this type of testimony in the name of the Disciples of Christ? Or, better still, might not the American Christian Missionary Society underwrite it, as a new and important departure in its plan of operation? Failing these supporting agencies, we confidently hope that the Council on Christian Unity will consider the value of this suggestion and attempt to put it into effect.

The significance of this letter lies not alone in the suggestive contribution it makes, but in the source from which it comes. It is written by the secretary of the Disciples' missionary work in Illinois. Too often the state secretary is the last man to approve a plan of unity which involves the broadening of the congregation's interests beyond those of his denomination.

Only this week another correspondent from Illinois writes us of the failure of a hopeful union movement between a congregation of Disciples and one of another body in an Illinois village, simply because the state secretary of the other denomination advised against it.

It will be a more significant step than even the formation of the Council on Christian Union if the secretaries of our state missionary societies and of the American Missionary Society will grapple earnestly with the problem which the above letter clearly indicates our far-visioned Illinois secretary is aready working upon.

That the churches backing them would support them in this effort there can be no room for doubt.

Social Survey

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

The Boy Scouts

Churches are worrying about "the boy problem." Many are enough in earnest about it to quit scolding and attempt to devise means for winning the boy, counting all things lawful if by any means they can win some. The Y. M. C. A. has had great success with its Junior department, and any large church could adopt its methods. Smaller churches could do the same were it not for the fact that they regard sectarian interest of more value than they do the welfare of the boys. They could do it by uniting for the effort.

Baden-Powell, of South African war fame, is a devoutly religious man. He deplores the waste of boy lives. He was brought to consider it by the revelations of youthful degeneracy and the amazing wreck of young lives as demonstrated in the recruits for the Boer war. He knows well, too, the thrall of the war spirit to the youthful mind. So he set about devising a means whereby the fascination of the military could be used to win the lads from evil and loose habits and inspire them with soldierly bearing without making them soldiers. He believed that which made a boy love soldierliness could be turned into a social and religious knight-errantry.

In less than three years he has enlisted a half million boys. Visitors to England last summer found every village green a rendezvous, so to speak. The boys are formed into small squads of from twenty to thirty, with a leader. They wear a simple costume and carry, not rifles but staves. It is gratifying to note that General Powell does not make much of drill. He says drill reduces the individual to the dead level, and he wants to cultivate individuality. So drill is used just enough to give company spirit and keep-step habits. Its purpose is coöperation. The better method of using camping parties, scouting and out-door exercises, and country tramping is used. The boys are exhorted not to smoke and to live clean and manly lives. The love of nature is instilled before all things.

But this is but the beginning. The Boy Scout is not a soldier going forth to war for fellow man. He is taught that athletics and fun is wholesome and good, but that a boy must think clean before he can act right. He is put under obligation to help all in need, to be courteous, to revere religion, and to love his country and fellow-men. Indeed, this is the supreme end for which all else is done.

Catholic Charity

With all its evils of creed and system, the Catholic church excels in the gifts of Christian charity. Catholics do not give more to charity than do Protestants, nor are they more charitable, but the church as an organization does the work of Christian charity on a scale that ought to shame a divided Protestantism. Doubtless the greater number of the workers in the organized charity of the land are members of Protestant churches, but the fact that their work has to be done through extra church organizations and that the vast majority of them are led by their very work of charity to become the keenest and most unanswerable critics of their own churches, ought to point a moral to Protestantism. Whether charity loses or not, the church loses for all her good works when she leaves the Christly work of "visiting the fatherless and the widows in their affliction" to non-church organizations. But this she must do so long as she prefers the mint and anise of the creed to the weightier matters of righteousness.

Catholic charities have reached the dignity and proportions of a National Conference. Its first national session was held in Washington recently and was attended by 500 delegates. The social message of that meeting did not sound any different from that which came from the great National Conference of organized charity in St. Louis, where Jane Addams so bravely sounded out the note that justice in the world of industry would save the need of charity to a greater extent than could the alms of Christendom ever give for a cure. So this Catholic Conference denounced "the merchant prince, grown rich on defrauding laborers of their wages" and declared war on the causes of poverty. "The Church and Social Reform," "The Church and the Social Conscience," "The Catholic Layman and Social Reform" were among the topics discussed, while the usual problems of dependency and delinquency were given whole sessions.

Be it said to the credit of the Conference that a proposition to hold separate state conferences was voted down and an exhortation to take a more active part in the regular non-sectarian state conference sent out. It will be a wholesome day when the Protestant denominations find a place in their national convention to consider their part in the work of organized charity.

A Human Call to the Churches

The Red Cross stamp has become a Christmas symbol. In the season of gift-making we are beautifully sanctifying our gifts of friendship by the emblem of a gift to "one of the least of these" and a symbol of our enlistment in the great Christian army of those who would "visit the sick in their affliction."

Last year the sale of Red Cross stamps reached a total of nearly a quarter of a million dollars. This year that great humanitarian organization has sounded out the rallying cry of "A Million for Tuberculosis" and has printed 25,000,000 stamps as a beginner in the Christmas crusade. They are to be called "seals," however, instead of stamps. The postal departments have experienced so much difficulty through the efforts of the simple-minded to use them for letter postage that this means is taken to try to correct an abuse that threatened to forbid the use of them altogether. They ask that they be used on the back of the letters and packages only, in order that a uniformity of custom may be established and trouble saved the post-office departments of the various nations. Some countries will not receive letters that have them stuck on the address side.

This is a call to the churches. It will be easy to realize a million for tuberculosis if the millions who celebrate Christmas in the churches and who hold the cross the symbol of their salvation will join the crusade, more holy than were ever the famed Crusades of history, to banish a dread plague from among humanity. Let the Sunday-schools teach the children that this beautiful little red cross "seal" typifies that which Jesus did when he visited the sick, and that it may become a cross of consecration on their Christmas happiness. Let the churches become official centers for the sale of these stamps and turn the children's and young ladies' societies into committees to distribute and sell them. Why should the most successful, far-reaching and inviting crusade against human suffering that characterizes our age of beneficence just at this time be ignored by the churches as organizations? Anybody can write to American Red Cross, Washington, D. C., for particulars.

A Universal Race Congress

With memories of Edinburgh fresh in our minds and the benefits of the Chicago Congress of Religions widely manifest, we are invited to consider another universal congress that promises much for the cause of growing internationalism from both the political and social viewpoint. It is The First Universal Races Congress, called to meet at the University of London from the 26th to the 29th of next July. The real idea of the congress is for East to meet West and talk over the common world problem as brothers. Current political topics will be tabooed, but cannot help being vastly influenced by such meetings as these.

The idea originated in the splendid brain of Felix Adler, of New York, almost five years ago. The invitations have already received responses from fifty different nations, and forty men of international reputation have accepted places on the program. The meetings will be opened by an address by a Hindu, and East will meet West on common ground, on both the platform and in the forum. The idea is that Occident and Orient are to meet as such, with the desire for an understanding of each other and the cultivation of that mutual respect that will come out of such an understanding. On all themes a distinguished Oriental will be placed alongside an eminent Occidental.

The object of the congress is thus stated officially: "To discuss, in the light of modern knowledge and the modern conscience, the general relations subsisting between the peoples of the West and those of the East, between so-called white and so-called colored peoples, with a view to encouraging between them a fuller understanding, the most friendly feelings and a heartier coöperation." In fact, the supreme idea is to cultivate a conscience toward one another. Such questions as the following will be discussed: Meaning of Race and Nation, Conditions of Progress, Peaceful Contact between Civilizations, Inter-Racial Economics, The Modern Conscience in Relation to Racial Questions, Promoting Inter-Racial Friendliness.

The official languages will be English, French, German and Italian, and Oriental languages will be permitted. The proceedings will be printed in both English and French. Membership is open to anyone who will apply to Mr. G. Spiller, 63 South Hill Park, Hampstead, London.

The Progress of the Cities

The new census shows the expected increase of population city-ward. There is no hope for anything else in this age. "Back to the country" agitation is good for the help of individuals who find themselves enmeshed in the misfortunes of city life, but ours is a complex life and the city is its shrine. Soon the cities will elect the majorities in congress as in some states they do today in the legislatures. It behooves us to ask what progress the cities are making, and the answer is not ungratifying, though it is full of perplexities.

Our metropolis has today the best mayor of its history. Mayor Gaynor is not only able and courageous, but he is efficient. He is a man of high ideals and democratic spirit and believes it is better worth while to govern New York City than to be governor of the state or president of the United States, for here our life meets its greatest problems and our civilization its supreme test. He cannot be purchased by the bribe of higher office, by the lure of so-called "Big Business," which means franchise privileges and other modern forms of exploiting the public, nor by any plea of party fealty.

Chicago has a "City Beautiful" scheme. It designs an expenditure of millions to make it a Paris of America and to expedite traffic and commerce, but it forgot to do anything for the tenements. Portland has adopted a "City Sensible" scheme and proposes to deal with living rather than æsthetic and commercial problems. Boston has a "Nineteen-Fifteen Campaign" which is designed to arouse civic patriotism and begin an effort to make a model city both in government and living conditions.

Des Moines has taken central place on the map of smaller cities by its non-partizan municipal government, and already scores of smaller cities are following suit. The knell of the franchise grabber is ringing in all the cities, and the new day of efficient administration is fast replacing the old days of graft and corporation exploitation. Denver has recently won one of the most desperately fought battles against long-entrenched franchise blood-sucking that any city of the nation has ever fought. San Francisco has refused to clean up, but has served as a warning example of municipal depravity to all other American cities. A new day is coming through non-partizanship, the initiative, referendum and the recall.

Practical Esperanto

This is the age of universal congresses. The International Prison Congress was held in Washington recently, an International Congress of Public Relief and Private Philanthropy was held just previously in Copenhagen under the presidency of Ex-President Loubet, the Ecumenical Missionary Conference at Edinburgh is now calling forth books on its work and portent, the First Universal Races Congress is called for London next July, and preparations are under way for the next Esperantist Congress in Antwerp next summer. The last was held in Washington in August and was a great success, both in point of international attendance and in the easy use of the language in its sessions.

At Edinburgh, only those who could use English could speak. Of course the missionary propaganda is so preponderantly Anglo-Saxon that the hardship was not great to other than English speaking folk. But in the Copenhagen Congress, the speaker used his own language where he could not use French, and the result was a sad hampering of the discussions, indeed, a practical abandonment of discussion. Here is a field for the practical use of Esperanto. It may never become in any sense a universal language, but it is easily learned and its advocates claim it is most flexible and expressive. Delegates to the Washington congress testify that each man heard as if in his own tongue and that it proved a perfect medium for interlingual expression.

Those who are in the circle of these universal meetings might do well to learn Esperanto. It is simple and more easily learned than any idiomatic tongue. A few months' intelligent application will acquaint anyone with it enough to make it usable to him. Why would it not be practicable to make it the medium of diplomatic intercourse and thus make it possible for men to qualify for universal diplomatic service. Sixteen governments sent official representatives to the Washington Congress. The idea is taking hold, and in course of time either Esperanto or some better neutral tongue will be adopted for international intercourse. No less than twenty-five different nationalities participated at this last congress.

The Paradox of Chicago

Chicago presents that curious paradox in city administration which the rising tide of demand for efficient and humanitarian municipal administration alone could reveal when it overflows suddenly the old partizan and corruptionist method of city government. The present mayor was elected by those financial interests that desired to conserve all that was left in the franchise and contract grab bag. It has been proven to the moral satisfaction of all good men that graft has been rampant in the offices under his appointment. The grand juries have indicted a number of the officials, the Merriam Commission has revealed the most extravagant wastefulness and commercial favoritism, and the newspapers have made out a strong case in attempting to prove that the sinuous form of the reptile nested close to the executive offices themselves. It is claimed that a certain "firm" that obtained many large contracts for supplies had no offices, no warehouses, no salesmen, but only a mythical being under the hat of a secretary in the mayor's office. The police force became so notorious that public demand forced the appointment of a man who is above reproach, and a general airing of notorious conditions has been taking place.

On the other hand, this same mayor has been lending his aid to every suggestion for humanitarian efforts. He appointed the best Health Commissioner in the history of the city; he granted the request of the Ministerial Federation for a Commission on the vice problem and appointed the best men of the city upon it, and he lends his aid to all forms of public relief. Yet none are deceived. It was once possible for corrupt politicians to lend aid to good causes that did not interfere with their particular interests and to thereby make a display of virtue that made good but scrutinizing people doubt all challenges of their municipal patriotism.

Chicago moves rapidly in the realm of humanitarian enterprises. She has one of the most efficient school systems among cities. She has voted a mill tax levy for the fight on tuberculosis that will yield a half-million this year and may be made a million next. But she moves slowly in the realm of municipal virtue, and she will so long as contractors and franchise stockholders select the executors of her municipal business.

The Visitor

The following lines were inadvertently omitted from the Visitor's account of his New York trip two weeks since.

The church at East Orange, New Jersey, of which L. N. D. Wells is the minister, reports prosperous times.

There are several Disciples at work in Union Theological Seminary and in Columbia University. They ought to organize a New York Disciples' club like the one at Yale.

Professor Herbert Martin, who is connected with the Training School for Teachers is a sort of shepherd of our unattached ministers who are studying in New York.

Professor O. B. Clark of Drake is pursuing graduate studies in Columbia.

On the way back from New York the Visitor was permitted to enjoy an evening with the friends at the First Church in Philadelphia. It is always a pleasure to meet this fine company of people. The interest manifested in the occasion was proof of the excellent work being accomplished by L. E. Sellers, the pastor, who succeeded L. G. Batman last year. The conditions prevailing in this church, like those in the First Church of New York, emphasize the difficulty of our problem in the east, and the constancy and courage with which the work is being carried forward by the congregations.

The Chicago Campaign of Evangelism

At the present time, the city of Chicago is interested as never before in a campaign of evangelism. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and his singer, Mr. Alexander, are conducting a simultaneous crusade in all parts of the city, with great central meetings on the south, the west, and the north sides.

This is the first time such a plan has been tried with anything like thoroughness in Chicago. Several efforts have been made hitherto in the direction of an evangelistic uprising in the city, but with far less promise of success.

The organizing body under whose direction the present campaign is prosecuted is the Laymen's Evangelistic Council, in coöperation with the Federal Council of the Churches. This coöperation is the feature that marks an advance over any former effort.

Two years ago the Laymen's Evangelistic Council conducted a series of meetings in a great tent on the North Side. Dr. R. A. Torrey, of the Moody Bible Institute, an evangelist of some reputation, was the leader. Large audiences were secured at first, but the interest waned and the results were unsatisfactory.

Last year the Laymen's Evangelistic Council secured Gipsy Smith, of England, who held a really great series of meetings in a large auditorium near the center of the city. Immense crowds were present every night. Earnest efforts were put forth by ministers and churches to make the meetings a success. Perhaps the gospel has never been preached in this city with greater winsomeness and power.

Multitudes expressed their determination to live a better life. The names of hundreds were taken down upon cards to be distributed to the churches of their choice. Yet the total perceptible results, so far as the ministers and churches were able to gather them, were so meager and disappointing as to be the subject of almost universal comment and regret.

This year the matter has been taken up much more systematically, and the campaign carried on with an efficiency of method that leaves little to be desired. Months have been spent in preparing for the meetings. A religious census of Chicago was taken, under the direction of the Cook County Sunday-school Association. Three great centers have been prepared for the South, West, and North Sides respectively. At each of these places Mr. Chapman and his helpers is conducting a two weeks' campaign.

Mid-day services are held daily in a central theater in the loop district, and on certain days additional services are held for women at another theater.

In connection with these central services, a body of eighty evangelists has been brought to Chicago from many states, and even from Europe. Fifty centers of simultaneous evangelistic effort have been organized throughout the city. In these centers local groups of churches are coöperating under the leadership of some one of the evangelists and his accompanying leader of song.

These local centers average five churches each. A very general response has been made to the request of the Laymen's Evangelistic Council that all the protestant evangelical churches shall coöperate.

Many of these churches and their ministers believe implicitly in any form of evangelism, and are only too glad to undertake the work. Others—and these not a few—are doubtful as to the method and the results, but feel that any effort which can bring the churches into unity and activity ought to be tried out in the most earnest way. And for that reason they are putting their best efforts into the local campaigns.

If evangelism of this sort can be effective in any circumstances in such a city as Chicago, it should prove so now. No effort is being spared, no expense has been saved, and no lack of earnest effort is perceptible.

Dr. Chapman is a man of exceptional ability. His method is simple, direct, convincing. He is a manly man, devoid of rant, slang, emotionalism or stage tricks. His appeal is direct but never prolonged. There is absolutely no coercion, begging, or brow-beating in his call to repentance and amendment of life.

He depends much on the power of music and the spell of two or three familiar hymns. But this is the only appeal to the emotions that he makes. Men who have grown suspicious and weary of the noisy and superficial methods that bring in multitudes whom the church is powerless to retain, find everything to approve and nothing to condemn in Dr. Chapman's work.

Mass evangelism is on trial in a most favorable atmosphere for a thorough test of its value. Great numbers of people are responding to the call both at the central services and in the local centers. The permanent value of the work can be known only after many days. Certainly Christianity has never been interpreted more convincingly than is the case in these services.

The great question which more insistently every day presses upon the church is this: Is mass evangelism an aid or a hindrance to the deep and permanent growth of the kingdom of God? Is the true evangelism a question of mass meeting or of individual education? Is the revival the means by which the church is to grow, or is it the properly administered Sunday-school and home that is to be the recruiting agent for the church of the future?

The results of this campaign in Chicago will help to answer these questions.

"And To Die Is"—What?

He was a wise man who said that there is one moment, and only one moment, in a man's career when he has a right to be thoughtless, and that is the moment of death. As he sees the near approach of death, he may leave off planning and striving and surrender himself to his fate. As long as there is a chance for life, the brave man has something to do.

The Christian prepares for life, not for death. When he thinks of the last hour of his earthly existence, he girds himself for the task immediately before him. "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work." The Master of us all prepared for death by doing the work of a day in its day.

Paul was a fighter. He had no intention of running away from the foes of his faith. The suicide, unless he is deranged, is apt to be a coward. Often he leaves wife and children to struggle alone against poverty. Instead of meeting the disgrace which has come to him through the exposure of his crooked dealing and using it for moral renovation, the defaulter shows his lack of manhood by taking his own life. The bankrupt has the opportunity of giving the world an example of courage and fidelity, which he misses by committing suicide.

The reason for Paul's desire to hear the call of his Master to lay down the burdens of his apostleship is not to be sought in any lack of concern for the welfare of others. It was his delight to secure benefits for others. He rejoiced that Christ was preached, even when the preachers were his own personal enemies. When love is gone, it would seem to be the natural thing for a man to quit life. The letter to the Philippians reveals a heart aglow with love. Life was full of interest for Paul, even when he was in prison.

The human organism has its age limit. Paul was an old man. He had led a strenuous life. He bore upon his body the marks of man's hate. He recognized that the period of his service was drawing to a close. His thoughts turned to the other world. Its rewards appeared so rich and certain that he began to long for them.

"Grandma," said a friend to a faithful disciple of the Lord, "I hope you will live to be a hundred years old." "No, no," came the reply, "that would be waiting too long." Her husband and nearly all the friends of her youth had gone on before and she desired to be with them. Her work here, she felt, was done. But at an earlier period in her life this woman said to her surgeon, who told her she must submit to a severe operation if she hoped to live much longer, "My family needs me, I put myself in your hands."

It is anti-Christian for any one to ask for release from the cares of life so long as he is needed. Interest in the other world that unfits one for present duty is no part of sound religious feeling. God is with us now and here. If he is not, there is not much reason to hope that he will ever be with us. Those who glorify and enjoy him now may hope to glorify and enjoy him forever. "The land of pure delight" is surely not altogether in that "undiscovered country." The disciple may live on its borders and eat some of its fruits in the present. It is pessimistic to locate the city of God entirely beyond the borders of earth. The seer of Patmos saw it coming down out of heaven and he heard a voice proclaiming, "The tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall dwell with them." Our work has something to do with the coming of the city of God to earth. But what will come after death?

"We have but faith: we cannot know;
For knowledge is of things we see."

If God is what Christ represents him to be, we cannot doubt that in the future we shall know love as we have not known it here. And if love is to rule supremely in the habitation of God, there will be work for the children of God to do. Love expresses itself in service. In heaven there will be no substitute for that high appreciation of personality which we call love. How we are to do good to persons under the conditions of their existence after death we do not know. It is enough that we have faith in the goodness of God. Curious speculations are repugnant to faith that is pure and steady.

Midweek Service, Nov. 16. Phil. 1:21.

Our Fellowship and the Task

Concluding Part of Presidential Address at Topeka Convention

BY PETER AINSLIE.

We are accustomed to speak of preaching the whole Gospel when it includes faith, repentance and baptism—and I would not lessen the place of these—but the divine exhortation is, having conformed to the doctrine of the first principles of Christ, let us press on unto perfection. The whole Gospel is not alone faith, repentance and baptism, but love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness and self-control. We have established among ourselves a conscience on faith, repentance and baptism, and I am not ashamed of it, but the time is at hand when we must likewise establish throughout our whole brotherhood equally as deep a conscience on the fruit of the Spirit. The spiritual necessities of our time demand God in all our being.

Our Humiliating Division.

As wearers of the name Christian only, we are bound by all the sufferings of Christ and the hope of the resurrection to a vital brotherhood among ourselves, yet the last decade has witnessed the culmination of a division among us on missionary society and anti-missionary society methods, which is as absurd a cause for division as the wearing of buttons instead of hooks and eyes among the Anabaptists in the seventeenth century caused to rise a "Button Party" and a "Hook and Eye Party" that lasted for generations. The fever in these little matters is too contagious. If the missionary methods do not just suit us, and I say this for those who are regular contributors and then stop because the officials of the society do something we do not like, let us remember that the missionaries on the field are the representatives of Christ to the unsaved. They must not suffer because of our folly, but we are honored in being allowed to contribute to their support. Such persons may take their spite out on anything they please, if they please to do that way, but never on the men and women who have left home and friends to go to the unsaved to tell of Jesus and the resurrection from the dead.

Unity Among Ourselves.

While the union sentiment is so prevalent among all Christians, we must see that it is the pre-eminent sentiment among ourselves. It is not an uncommon thing to hear it said among us, "I am a Standard man," or "I am an Evangelist man," or "I am a Century man," as it was said years ago, "I am of Paul," and "I am of Apollos," and "I of Cephas." We ought to be ashamed to line up in any such fashion, for it betrays as much carnality now as it did in the days of the Corinthians. For my part, I would as soon wear a denominational name among my religious neighbors as to wear a class name among my own people. I read these three papers every week and I know of no reason why I should not continue to do so, but I belong to none of them, other than I am a part of all my brethren. Instead of so much fault finding, let us stand up in the gateway of this new century and pray for the editors of all our papers, for more things are wrought by prayer than the soul has dreamed.

Disciples' Duty Toward Peace.

I hear a thousand voices from around the world crying against war—some are the voices of Christians, some pagans, some infidels; but I have heard no loud voice from among the Disciples and yet logically we ought to have been among the loudest voices for international disarmament and universal peace. I will not take up arms against my brother, for I carry in my bosom, as you do in yours, a greater power for the solution of national and international problems than the combined armies of all the world. As wearers of the name Christian only, hostility to war should be as deeply rooted in our conscience as it is in the conscience of our Quaker brethren, and especially at this time, since the fever of war is burning in the bones of certain European and Asiatic nations.

I hope the time will come when the Disciples of Christ as a body—not by resolution, but because of conscience—will decline their quota in the chaplaincy of the United States army and the United States navy. The church is not to be partisan, but to think and act as though parties did not exist, for it is of little matter whether political parties are pleased or offended by any action taken by the Church of God. Christ is supreme and the spirit and genius of His religion is opposed to war.

God's Holy Day.

No people should be more zealous for the observance of the Lord's Day than those who wear the name Christian only. The bloody cross and the broken tomb have mysteriously met in the Lord's Supper, which we observe on that day. I regret to say that there is a strong tendency among the Disciples to shorten the observance of the supper and among Christians generally to shorten the holiness of the Lord's Day. I would that all our churches might lengthen the period of the supper—God knows we need it—and cut out some of those superfluous numbers in the morning program. I would that all American Christianity might let the holiness of the Lord's Day rather overflow into the other days instead of limiting it. It is a recognized fact that the shortening or desecrating of the sacred day of any religion is the indication of decay.

For Protection of the Home.

As wearers of the name Christian only, we are pledged to the protection of the home and consequently we must be unfriendly to the wholesale American divorce practice, which is becoming the scourge of the nation. Divorce is increasing three times faster than the population and America is out-ranked in this shame by only two nations in the world—Algeria, which is under the blight of Mohammedanism, and Japan, which is under the blight of paganism. When the state breaks the marriage covenant, let the magistrate of the state perform the marriage of those who have been divorced and let all ministers of Christ remember that it was He who said: "Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another committeth adultery against her; and if she herself shall put away her husband and marry another, she committeth adultery."

Sworn Enemies of the Saloon.

By virtue of our allegiance to Christ, we are the sworn enemies of the saloon. There is no place for compromise in the liquor traffic. Its revenue to the state is the profit of a contract that belongs by the side of that of Eve and Judas. This tragedy of civilization must be cast out if our civilization is to survive and he who cares so little for his brother, as to care most for his so-called "personal liberty" has not yet broken all his ties with sin.

These worms of crime and those akin to them are eating at the roots of the tree of our present day civilization and only a deepening conscience in Christian ethics and a definite practicing of personal holiness can save our civilization from increasing blots. It is not enough to merely wear the name Christian, for nothing will suffice for these times other than reproducing the Christ life until faith in Jesus shall absolutely triumph over faith in dogma, for "there is nothing in the sphere of feeling so distinct, and at the same time, so profound as the response within us to a personified holiness."

Surely great issues are before us—this mighty nation and its message to the world, this mightier Gospel and the prophecies of its triumph, and this golden day of opportunity and its service. We cannot turn aside for minor issues. A united church and a redeemed continent are issues so overwhelming as to furnish themes for hundreds of sermons in the pulpit, absorbing conversations in the home and on the street and numberless articles for our religious journals. It must not be forgotten that truth is the only merit that gives worth and dignity to a message. With the open Bible—not parts of it, but all of it—and with the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, by Whom we have been anointed for service and by Whom we have been sealed unto the day of redemption, we shall be equipped for the task.

Times Call For Educated Men.

These times demand men of education. Both brain and heart are made to be developed. The schools can do only a part of educating. They give to the student the tools, by which he lays the foundation for a structure, upon which he climbs to its wide-visioned heights. Too many men drop their tools on the college steps and go stumbling into life and finding fault because their education is not appreciated. The fact is, the man is not educated. He has the tools but they have rusted from misuse. It is not education to know the roots of words and the solution of geometrical problems, but as Nicholas Murray Butler says: "Education is a gradual adjustment to the spiritual possession of the race," and "its purpose is," said Herbert Spencer, "to prepare us for complete living." Away with that barbarous interrogation, "What has the young man learned?" But I ask the question of civilization: "What has the young man become?" Our young men for the ministry should have the best educational equipment that they may become the best servants possible to the Lord Almighty. After their college days, they should seek to make life the school room for their real education, as well as real service. Every college should teach their ministerial students not only how to make a sermon according to the rules of homiletics, but how to write a readable article for the secular press, for there is as much art in the one as in the other and the neglect of the former, especially by the Disciples, is another instance of our failure to use God-given opportunities, for both the pulpit and the press are mighty avenues for God and His ministry should seek to be skilled in the use of both.

Need of a Praying Ministry.

A radical defect in the training of our modern ministry in all churches is not teaching young men the secrets of holiness and the power of prayer. The Disciples did not ask Jesus to teach them how to preach, but how to pray. I do not mean literary instruction, I do not mean the lessons of the class room, but I mean a man in touch with God ought to lead young men out of his own experience into the experience of the consciousness of God, the fellowship of Christ and the blessedness of prayer, until the young man is able to say out of his own experience and conviction, "I know Whom I believe." That is the ministry this world is waiting for and until that ministry comes, the nations will not be brought to the foot of the cross.

4. All this is preliminary to the first and chief purpose of our existence as Disciples of Jesus Christ. Fellowship with the good, union with all believers, faithfully practicing Christian ethics—these are but the beginnings, for the task over all is working together with God to make ourselves like Jesus. Our confession meant this, and if such was not our conception of baptism, our baptism has become unbaptism.

The Disciples' Calvary.

The altar of Calvary was for Him, but the altar of the living sacrifice is for us. By the Holy Spirit, He died for us and by the Holy Spirit, we put to death the doings of our bodies that we may live for Him. Of all investments, the safest are our ventures of faith. There is only one way to the heights and that is by way of holiness. Theories of them may be beautiful, but he only knows them who treads them. "All things," says Coleridge, "strive to ascend by striving." The vision longs for the summit and in the depths of us are hidden qualities, treasures of concealed power, that are made for the higher atmosphere of the mountain top, intimating that that which we are not yet is the greatest part of us. The Kingdom is coming. God is in us, lifting us out of our sins, lengthening our vision, deepening our longing and consecrating all our being to His glory.

"A fire-mist and a planet,
  A crystal and a cell;
A jelly-fish and a saurian,
  And caves where the cave men dwell;
Then a sense of law and of beauty
  And a face turned from the clod.
Some call it evolution,
  And others call it God.

"A haze on the far horizon,
  The infinite tender sky,
The ripe, rich fruits of the cornfields,
  And the wild geese sailing high;
And over all upland and lowland
  The charm of the golden-rod.
Some of us call it Autumn,
  And others call it God.

"Like tides on a crescent sea-beach,
  When the moon is new and thin,
Into our hearts high yearnings
  Come welling and surging in.
Come from the mystic ocean,
  Whose rim no foot has trod.
Some of us call it longing,
  And others call it God.

"A picket frozen on duty,
  A mother starved for her brood.
Socrates drinking the hemlock,
  And Jesus on the rood;
And millions who, humble and nameless,
  The straight, hard pathway trod.
Some call it consecration,
  And others call it God."

A Visit to Rich Hill, Ireland

The Last Old-World Home of Thomas Campbell

ERRETT GATES.

On my way from Ballymena to Rich Hill I took occasion to visit Belfast, the metropolis of Ireland. It is a city of about 360,000 inhabitants, and is located in the valley of the River Loggan, near the point where it broadens into the Belfast Lough or Bay. Its principal industries are linen manufacture and ship-building. There are in operation 835,000 spindles and 31,500 looms. The two ship-building yards of Harland & Wolff, and Workman, Clark & Co., employ 20,000 hands and place Belfast at the head of the ship-building trade of the world. It is a thoroughly modern city in every respect. Its principal buildings are the new Town Hall, a structure that would do honor to any city in the world of similar size and for elegance, situation, and perfection of appointment, surpasses the Town Hall of Glasgow, a city twice its size; the new Technical Institution and the Presbyterian Assembly Hall and Buildings.

Belfast is a Presbyterian stronghold, and very naturally should be, since the whole of northeastern Ireland, covering, roughly, the province of Ulster, is strongly Presbyterian. It has always been dominated by a prevailing Scotch element, which gives this part of Ireland both a different religious and a different economic standing. It is the most prosperous, as it is also the most enlightened section of the island. The benumbing rule of the priest and politician is not felt here.

Valuable Records Lately Lost.

Besides seeing the city, I had an interest in calling upon the librarian of the Presbyterian Historical Society, Mr. A. Albert Campbell, who might be of some use in furthering my historic mission. The Seceder Presbyterians with whom Thomas Campbell was connected were merged with the regular Presbyterian body during the first half of the nineteenth century, so that all Seceder memorials and memoirs and Seceder history belong now to the one Presbyterian church of Ireland. To my great disappointment I learned from Mr. Campbell that the original records and minutes of the Secedar presbyteries and synods in Ireland, from 1788 to 1818, have been lost within the last twenty-five years. I was anxious to go over them to ascertain what part Thomas Campbell had in the larger councils of the Seceders. Richardson in the Memoirs gives us very little information on this point; and I fear now that we shall have to be content with what he has preserved.

The most important part of my Irish pilgrimage now lay before me—the visit to Rich Hill and Aharey, the places of Thomas Campbell's last residence in Ireland and of his most memorable work in the old world. I started out early Saturday morning from the hotel in Belfast for the station, and on the way encountered a plainly dressed Irishman going in the same direction. He began the conversation by remarking that he had had a rough voyage during the night from Liverpool, and that he was on his way to the country to secure work. I thought I was a good judge of the professional town beggar and tourist baiter, and felt sure he was not one of them. His talk was so unprofessional and his manner so consistent for the first few blocks that he entirely won my confidence. He noticed that I shifted my travelling bag from hand to hand to relieve the tug, and like a good fellow-traveller he volunteered to take it a while. I yielded with some apology for its weight, for it contained the two plethoric volumes of Richardson's Memoirs of Alex. Campbell, my camera and metal tripod, and a few other books and pamphlets I had picked up on my pilgrimage. I soon found that I was in the hands of, and unwittingly under obligation to, one of the most bare-faced and stubborn beggars I had ever met. An Irishman had trapped a Yankee who prided himself on his ability to keep out of the clutches of the tourist beggar and hanger-on.

I arrived at the Rich Hill station after a journey of twenty-five miles, through country that looked like the average landscape of Michigan or Ohio—well-cultivated, productive, and gently rolling. The town of Rich Hill is one and a half miles from the station, with no provision by way of trains or cars for carrying the passenger over the hills to the town. Fortunately so, for I had a chance on foot to view the beautiful landscape of undulating hills, checkered with alternating fields of ripening wheat and oats and the deeper green of the pastures; and to pluck an occasional blackberry from bushes that filled the hedge-rows on both sides of the road into the town. There never appeared to me more beautiful or more prosperous farm country than this. This is the country which, Richardson tells us, King William the Third said, when he first looked upon it, was worth fighting for.

The Campbells' Meeting House.

The most conspicuous object in the buildings of the town as I approached it was the steeple of the Episcopal Church which stands on the summit of the hill over-looking the town, as it winds down the sides of it in two streets at right angles. I soon found the Independent meeting-house, which the Campbells attended evenings after their return from the morning service in the Seceder church at Aharey, two and one-half miles distant. In this meeting house the father and young son, twelve to eighteen years of age, listened to the great preachers of the time, such as Rowland Hill, J. A. Haldane, Alexander Carson, and with especial interest, John Walker. This was the church that observed the Lord's Supper every First Day of the week, and was organized in other elements of its faith and practice on the Apostolic model, by which the Campbells were impressed. The old building still stands as it stood more than one hundred years ago—a small stone structure, plastered and whitewashed on the outside, as is the case with most Irish buildings, both domestic and religious.

The Town Not Increasing.

I visited the old castle, in which the Honorable Wm. Richardson, M. P., lived in Thomas Campbell's time, and whose daughters were his private pupils. No one is left in the town who was able to point out the house in which the Campbells lived. The town is but little larger than it was a hundred years ago. It consists of about 100 families, has five churches, (Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, and Seceder), three public-houses (saloons), and five stores. The buildings are all low structures scarcely more than a story and a half in height; and several of the houses I entered have rough, broken stone floors. The inhabitants that are left seem to be of a low grade of intelligence; the brightest of the sons and daughters having left for the larger towns and cities, or for America or South Africa.

It was on a farm near rich hill that Thomas Campbell located his home when he first came to be pastor of the Seceder Church at Aharey in 1798. Within a short time, however, he moved into the town and opened a school, thus dividing his time between the work of school-teacher and minister. It was here that Alexander spent the years of his boyhood from twelve to eighteen, and here that he grew up through that period of youthful sportiveness, when he showed more interest in shooting birds than in studying French. But it was here also that he began to take part in the more serious work of his father's teaching, and "had much exercise of mind under the awakenings of a guilty conscience." "Finally, after many strugglings," he says, "I was enabled to put my trust in the Savior, and to feel my reliance on him as the only Savior of sinners."

After assuring myself that nothing definite could be ascertained as to the exact residence of the Campbells, I took my way on foot out to the home of Miss Lizzie Greer, whose name had been given me by the Presbyterian minister of Rich Hill, as a former member of the Aharey Church, and one who had seen Alex. Campbell on his visit to Aharey in 1847. Through misdirection the walk to her home, which was directly but two miles and a half from Rich Hill, had been lengthened into six.

Home of Nathaniel Greer at Rich Hill, in which Alexander Campbell was entertained in 1847.

I confessed my weariness when I arrived and it was not long before I was summoned to a refreshing repast, with Miss Greer and her companion, Miss Jardine. I had been prepared, by the descriptions of her home along the way, for a "grand place;" and such it proved to be in contrast with the mean, dirty, thatch-roofed houses I had visited all along the way in search for this one. The reason for my going astray was the fact that the Greers are as numerous in this country as the Smiths or Jones' in some parts of America.

I found at last the place I was looking for. The house stands back from the road or "loaning" as the people call it, and is approached through an avenue of ancient, overarching beeches, and square-trimmed hedges on either side. It was the most beautifully kept country place I had seen in the vicinity of Rich Hill, save the castle grounds in the town. The house is a two-story, very long stone structure, plastered and freshly whitewashed. The yard in front is carefully kept, and planted with shapely evergreens and flower plats. The interior of the house is elegantly, though simply furnished. Here lives Miss Greer, a maiden lady, of refined character, delicate health, in the seventy-sixth year of her age. She is the last surviving child of Nathaniel Greer, who was a boyhood friend and companion of Alexander Campbell. When Campbell visited Rich Hill in 1847, it was in this house that he was entertained a day and two nights. The story of this visit as told by Campbell is found in the Memoirs by Richardson, vol. 11, page 568.

At the time of this visit in 1847. Miss Greer was thirteen years of age, and she told of the impression made upon her by his coming. She remembers very distinctly the "peculiar tone of voice with which he read the Scriptures" at morning worship, and the very passage he read, the fifteenth chapter of the Gospel of John. She remembers how her father looked forward to his coming, and with what elation the visit filled him, and the entire family. She pointed out the room and the place where he sat: the house stands just as it did then—sixty-three years ago.

It is probable that Miss Greer is the only one living now in Ireland who met Campbell on that visit. I have heard of one or two in Scotland who met him then: but she is the only one I have met who saw him, and remembers him.

The Council on Christian Union

It may be remembered that in January of this year, I took the liberty as president of the American Christian Missionary Society, to call attention through our national papers to the necessity of the Disciples of Christ at this time taking definite steps towards making the Disciples' proposition for union known to the whole world and it was most cordially received by our editors and brethern generally.

This suggestion had in it a three-fold plan: (1) that we publish for free distribution among our religious neighbors and at nominal cost for distribution among ourselves, such tracts and books as will present with clearness the Disciples' position for Christian union by a return to the New Testament in name, in ordinances and in life; (2) that we establish a monthly magazine as a clearing house of thought on Christian union, inviting persons of all religious bodies to courteously speak through its pages on the theme of a united church, for there are thousands in all communions deeply interested in the union of believers; and (3) that we cultivate a more cordial fraternity with our religious neighbors by exchanging with them convention greetings, sending fraternal messengers to their annual gatherings and showing them by personal contact that our position is an unselfish desire for a united brotherhood of all believers.

"Unfinished Task of Reformation."

To test the practicability of the first item in the three-fold suggestion, later I sent out to ministers of other religious bodies in the United States and Canada a seventeen page tract as "an open letter to Protestants," entitled "The Unfinished Task of the Reformation." Replies have come from all parts of the country and in every instance they have been courteous and sympathetic. Some have asked for further correspondence, others for conference on the subjects presented and all have shown a deep interest in the union of Christians, indicating the ripeness of time for such a service.

At the recent Topeka convention, this three-fold suggestion was laid before a committee of brethern from all parts of the country representing our papers, our colleges, our ministry and our laymen and it was heartily endorsed. Mr. R. A. Long said the presses of the Christian Publishing Company were at the disposal of such a service to the extent of $10,000 a year for two years. Z. T. Sweeney said that he had friends who had already spoken of making a handsome contribution for a similar service, and many others declared that the time was ripe for such a move.

Constitution Drafted.

The committee of fifty, of which Finis Idleman was secretary, suggested that a committee be appointed to draft a constitution to be presented to a called mass meeting that afternoon (Wednesday, Oct. 19th) in the First Christian Church. This was done and the committee consisted of Hill M. Bell, J. H. Garrison, E. V. Zollars, Chas Reign Scoville and Carey E. Morgan. At the mass meeting, including perhaps from seven to eight hundred people, they all voted with enthusiasm for the adoption of the constitution and the "Council on Christian Union" became a fact and took its place by the side of our missionary organizations as of equal importance, for as Bro. Zollars said, union precedes evangelization, for it is only the united church that is competent to evangelize the world. It looked as though our new century convention was getting back to those original principles that gave the Disciples their existence nearly a hundred years ago.

The constitution of the Council provided that a committee of nine members be elected annually to execute the purposes of the Council and to make annual reports to the Council at the time of the annual meeting of our missionary organizations. It was suggested that a committee be appointed to name the first set of officers and that committee consisted of W. F. Richardson, R. G. Frank, J. W. Carpenter, F. M. Rogers and Miner Lee Bates. On the following afternoon (Thursday, the 20th), the committee on nominations recommended the following persons, who were elected: For president, Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, Md.; for vice-president, A. C. Smither, Los Angeles, Cal.; for secretary F. W. Burnham, Springfield, Ill.; for treasurer, E. M. Bowman 152-158 Ontario St., Chicago, Ill.; for additional members of the committee, Brethern Hill M. Bell, J. H. Garrison, I. J. Spencer, M. M. Davis and W. T. Moore.

Greetings to Other Brethren.

The first act of the Council was to send greetings to the Congregationalists in their National Council in Boston and to the Episcopalians in their General Convention in Cincinnati. These courteously reciprocated, the Congregationalists sending Psalms 16:11-

"Thou wilt show me the path of light:
In Thy presence is fulness of joy:
In Thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore;"

and the Episcopalians sending this: "The House of Bishops assembled in Cincinnati send greetings with a prayer for the unity of God's people to the Disciples in national convention assembled in Topeka."

H. Newton Miller was appointed as fraternal messenger from the Disciples to the national convention of the body of believers who call themselves the Christian Church and whose convention will shortly be held.

The committee met on Monday morning (the 17th) and at the instance of Dr. W. T. Moore an open letter on the necessity of union will be sent to all Christians and likewise a letter will be sent to our own brethern relative to a closer coöperation among ourselves. Conferences on Christian union will be held in various centers throughout the year and a great conference with speakers from other religious bodies is being prepared for our evening session at our next national convention.

On learning of this proposed letter to Christendom, the Church News Association, New York City, kindly tendered their service in distributing through the secular newspapers of the country, this message to Christendom, which would at once place it in the hands of millions of readers. It will cost us something, but that cost will not be great. Who is willing to help?

The Council is here for business. Its purpose, as stated in the constitution, "shall be to create and distribute literature bearing on Christian union among the people of our own and other religious bodies and to solicit and hold in trust funds for this purpose;" and also "to arrange conferences in important centers on the subject of Christian union."

With this clear outline of its origin and purpose, it belongs to us as Christians only to lend our enthusiasm and our prayers and our money for the advancement of this cause. Nothing among us has precedence over the union of Christendom. Bro. T. W. Phillips has made probably the greatest contribution to this cause since the days of the Campbells by writing his book and then putting $25,000 back of it until it has gone around the world in several languages. We have enlisted in a great cause. It demands our enthusiasm, our prayers and our money. We are under obligations to the Lord Himself to make known this message, for it is of Him and not of ourselves. We must either disseminate it among all Christians or abandon it, for we have not the moral right to hold it among ourselves, else we become guilty of the gravest infidelity to Christ. These hundred years' preparation have not been in vain. The practicability of this position has been proven. God has given us numbers and wealth and now the opportunity is before us for advancement to the real task of our existence as a separate people. It is hoped that all who read these lines will remember this cause in their prayer and that ministers will mention it in their public prayers, that the Spirit of Christ may guide in doing what must be done.

The Speech That Should Have Been Made

By P. J. Rice.

The New Century Convention has passed into history, and those who were in attendance are journeying homeward. It is inevitable that one traveling to a remote corner of our country should reflect, during the long hours and, in reflection see how certain impressions might have been materially modified.

On the whole the convention was a forward looking one. Some steps were taken in advance of anything we have dared to undertake in recent years. The consciousness that has been gradually awakening among us, that found voice in many notable utterances during the Centennial Convention a year ago, namely: "That the distinctive and peculiar mission of the Disciples is the plea for union has found embodiment in the "Christian Union Council"organized at Topeka. This action alone will make the New Century Convention memorable.

But there were some scenes which disturbed us all, some expressions of passion which we all deeply regretted. No one is very greatly disturbed over the fact that the resolution declaring in favor of a delegate convention failed to pass. Such a measure, however desirable it may seem to some to be, can well afford to abide the time when at least a very considerable majority can be made to feel heartily in sympathy with it. What distresses us is that we should ever have given way to excitement, to passion and to frenzied utterances at a moment when we should have been perfectly calm and self-possessed.

At a certain moment on Friday afternoon after the report of the committee on unification had been presented, when motions of one sort and another were being hurled at the President rather violently it would have been a happy circumstance if some one should have called us to a solemn halt for just a few moments at least. The speech that should have been made is about as follows:

Brethren, under present circumstances, what is most needed is a moment of calm in order that we may compose ourselves to dispose of this important matter. Whatever else may be important it is primarily demanded of us all just now that we take time to think. It will be well to refrain from all applause for a few minutes. Let us remember that we are not in political convention where politicians try to gain advantage by some trick of wit or parliamentary usage. We are brethren, disciples of Christ in conference regarding the best methods by which we may carry into effect the great commission. There are differences of judgment, but, let us confidently believe there are no sinister motives affecting any of us. No one is trying to sweep this assembly off its feet. Whatever we do let us do it calmly and in the consciousness that we are brethren.

I have no word to offer as to the merits of this resolution. I am not primarily concerned as to the disposal that shall be made of the committee's recommendation. But surely, we owe to the committee appointed a year ago, a committee of trusted brethren who have worked under our command, a respectful hearing.

Mr. President, I want to suggest that you request that we all now quietly bow our heads in prayer and that we remain in this attitude for at least three minutes, no one leading us. I am confident that everyone here will indulge you in such a request and regard it a privilege as well as a duty to comply with it.

Nobody made such a speech. Possibly nobody could have made it, but as I think over the scene it seems to me that if someone had been quick enough and sane enough to have made it we would have been saved a sense of humiliation and chagrin which I know came to many of us, and I am writing this suggestion in order to stimulate somebody to attempt such a course if ever again such circumstances arise.

While I am writing of the convention I want to present a single suggestion. Personally, I should be happy if it should turn out that we had held our last great public communion service. I cannot reconcile its necessarily spectacular features with my conception of what a communion service should be. I believe it should be a retreat, a quiet, solemn service amidst surroundings that easily lend themselves to reverent meditation. I do not mean to imply that the crowd at Pittsburgh or at Topeka was irreverent, but I do mean to say that I think every end sought could be much better gained by a dozen or more simultaneous assemblies in as many churches. It is hard to "shut the door" in the presence of such an unusual circumstance and where there are numerous disturbing and distracting occurrences. I wish this service could hereafter have a different setting. I may be alone in this feeling but I doubt if I am. I should be pleased to hear what others think.

The Brotherhood

By H. D. Williams.

There is still an interrogation point after the Men's Brotherhood. The Topeka convention did not remove it. Still men are asking two things about the Brotherhood, What is its aim, and what is its method? We know that its general aim is to utilize the now waste energies of the men in the churches. We also know that its general method is that of organization.

But we are asking for the specific aim and the specific method of the Brotherhood, and it is not easy to name them. Every now and then some man thinks he has given the needed answer, but in a short time his answer proves to be only a new-phrased statement of the general aim and method already recognized. The statement of Doctor Gunsaulus at Topeka is a good illustration of this. The eloquent Doctor said, "What is the work of the Brotherhood? Why, of course, it is to brother." That is very fine and good, as far as it goes; but it goes no farther than a general statement of aim which we had when the Brotherhood was born.

Nor will there be very soon any statement of the specific aim and method of the Brotherhood, for the simple and obvious reason that they must come to us through experience.

The men of our churches need to develop a problem consciousness—an appreciation of the fact that there are some great problems to be solved. They never will have such a consciousness till first they are awake to the problems of the local church. The first thing for the Brotherhood to do is for its local chapters to get at local problems. In solving these it will find its big, universal problem. It is folly to expect the men who will not tackle the problems of the local church, to render valuable service in the solution of national problems. It seems clear to me that the Brotherhood must find its broader mission through service in its own locality.

It is even so in the matter of method. The Brotherhood will never be able to effectively address itself to a national or world-wide undertaking until it has first learned the simple lesson of harmonious co-operation. The place to learn that lesson is in the local Brotherhood up against the local problems. It is a lesson our men have not yet learned. The fear of ecclesiastical tyranny has driven them to the extreme of church anarchy. They will not surrender themselves to an organization that binds them together for service by means of stipulated financial and moral obligations for specific ends. They tremble lest some pope stands behind the thing. Recently the writer was present in a Brotherhood meeting when half the members rebelled against any longer paying the five-cent monthly fee to the National organization, declaring that there is no need for such an organization. And to my astonishment, the minister joined the rebellion, asserting that he had no use for an organization seeking to reach into his church with so much authority.

How can the Brotherhood address itself effectively to any big undertaking so long as the faintest exercise of organic authority creates a mutiny among its members? Our men need to learn the lesson of united service, and they can best learn it in the local work.

Our Readers' Opinions

The Problem of Unimmersed Christians

[A reader who says he has many times been prompted to take part in the discussion of the question of practicing Christian union, sends us the following article contributed to The Pacific Christian by one "Phoebe." "These are my opinions," he says, and asks that they be printed on Our Readers' Opinions page as his contribution.—EDITORS.]

In the July number of the Millennial Harbinger of 1837 the Editor published a letter from a lady to himself criticising him for recognizing Protestant parties as Christians. In that letter she proposed this question for him to answer: "Does the name of Christ, or Christian, belong to any but those who believe the gospel, repent, and are buried by baptism into the death of Christ?"

In replying to this question he himself asked the question, "Who is a Christian?" answering it as follows: "Every one that believes in his heart that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God; repents of his sins, and obeys him in all things according to his measure of knowledge of his will." Mark the last clause, "obeys him according to his measure of knowledge of his will." Not according to another's measure, but according to his own measure of his own knowledge. This is just, this is right and creditable to the great and good man who said it.

In his justification and defense of this answer he makes use of some very striking statements. "An angel may mistake the meaning of a commandment, but he will obey it in the sense in which he understands it." And such has been the obedience of Protestant unimmersed Christians: they are in a class with this angel. Think of the Father of the spirits of men and angels shutting the door on this angel when he returns from his errand simply because he mistook the meaning of his instructions!

Again we read, "I cannot make any one duty the standard of Christian state or character, not even immersion into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Baptism cannot become the standard of Christian character, nor of the Christian state, and therefore it cannot scripturally become a test of fellowship. And then to rise to the apex of his climax he says, "I do not substitute obedience to one commandment for universal or even general obedience." If I get his meaning it is, that general obedience though it lack compliance with the letter of the baptismal ordinance is better than partial obedience, though it include exact compliance with this command. But the practice of the Disciples is often the reverse of this. To illustrate: Two men each wearing the name of Christ present themselves for membership in a church of the Disciples. The character of one is above reproach as he bears daily the fruit of the Spirit; but his name is refused enrollment with the saints on earth simply because he has not been immersed, notwithstanding he believes he has complied with the command to be baptized. The other is heartily received because he has been immersed, although his character smells of grog and even some other things.

But let us get at this from another angle: The sage of Tarsus says of true Christians that they "are no more strangers and foreigners but fellow citizens with the saints and of the household of God." Now, if Mr. Campbell is right in his conclusions concerning these unimmersed Christians that they are Christians indeed, then they "are fellow citizens with the saints and of the household of God." In another of Mr. Campbell's articles he says of citizens that they are "entitled to all the privileges, honors, and emoluments of the kingdom of heaven." By what authority then do Disciples deprive some of the citizens of the privileges of the Kingdom of Christ? They admit that the people who are in a class with Mr. Campbell's angel have their names written in the Lamb's Book of Life while they refuse to write their names on the roll with the saints on earth. The Disciples have charged the Baptists with the foolishness of making it easier to get into heaven than to get into their church in that they admit that these unimmersed Christians may sit at the table of the Lamb with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but refuse them a seat at the Lord's table on the earth. To the writer the Disciples are equally inconsistent: they admit these people to the Lord's table but deny them a place on the church roll. To me there is but one question in all this to be determined; that done and the church's duty is evident: Are these people citizens of Christ's kingdom? That settled in the affirmative we have no more jurisdiction in the matter of their right to a place on the roll of the saints than to a place at the Lord's table.

It is true, as Disciples contend, that there is no apostolic example for such procedure; but why? Simply because there were no such Christians in the days of the apostles, and therefore, the matter never came before them for adjudication. But the question finds its solution in the 14th chapter of the Roman letter wherein we are instructed how to deal with the untaught conscience of a Christian brother. Hear again the sage of Tarsus: "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God (and do not attempt to compel thy untaught brother to come up to thy standard.) Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth. An he that doubteth (in the present case in the matter of immersion) is condemned if he eat (be immersed while he doubts), because he eateth (is immersed) not of faith: for whatever is not of faith is sin."

The Disciples are begging for Christian Unity upon the basis of the Bible and the Bible alone, but instead of entering into fellowship with other Christians whose names they admit are enrolled in heaven, leaving their consciences free they seek to override them in the matter of this ordinance and compel a legal obedience in spite of their conscience. Let the Disciples admit to their church roll all that they concede have a right to the table of the Lord and a great and forward step will be taken toward Christian Unity such as they plead for. If they are right in their contention as to the meaning of this ordinance the more closely they associate themselves with other Christians who have gone astray in this matter the sooner will their views prevail. Such a course will go far toward removing the prejudice which is always a barrier to a just consideration of another's views. They need not in any sense become responsible for other forms of baptism than that for which they contend, and can preach their views with the same zeal as heretofore, receiving these people as Christians of Mr. Campbell's "angel type." The wisdom of this cannot be overlooked. It brings those who need to be taught, whereas as the Disciples now proceed they close the ears of these people to their teaching and drive them from them.

Let me close this article with one thing the Master said just before leaving his disciples for the cross: "I have many things to tell you but you cannot bear them now." I will wait till you are in such a state of mind as will enable you to hear, understand, and receive. May this wisdom of the Christ prevail in guiding us in the matter of these untaught and unimmersed Christians!

Baptism in the United Church

Dear Brother Morrison: I note your reply to Claude E. Hill of Valparaiso, Ind., in the Christian Century of October 6. There are a few things that you do not make clear.

You would, of course, receive a pious unimmersed preacher from another church into full fellowship in the Christian Church. And you would allow him to succeed you as pastor of the church. And if a convert of his insisted on being sprinkled before the assembled church, because both could do so conscientiously, you would have the church suffer him to sprinkle the convert. You thus grant him equal liberty as yourself to baptize in the mode he thinks scriptural, for the sake of encouraging him to come into organic unity with us. Please make clear to us readers of the Christian Century how far we must allow such pious unimmersed preachers liberty to baptize as they think scriptural.

L. W. SPAYD,
Franklin, Ill.

[Mr. Spayd entirely misconceives The Christian Century's position.

1. To begin with, The Christian Century has not anywhere discussed "pious unimmersed" people. Just what is meant by this classification we do not know. It is an ambiguous and invidious description. We are interested in facing the problem of practicing Christian union with Christian people, with people who are already just as truly members of the church of Christ as are we ourselves. We object to all non-committal descriptions of our Christian brethren, like "our religious neighbors," "members of the denominations," "the pious unimmersed" etc. We equally object to any patronizing attitude like that implied in the closing sentence of the otherwise excellent article above, preceding Mr. Spayd's question,—"those untaught, unimmersed Christians." This is not the true attitude for Disciples of Christ, pleading for union, to take. That is the Baptist position, not the Disciples'. The one fundamental presupposition of the Disciples' plea for union is that Congregationalists, Presbyterians and the rest, are truly Christians, not in character only but in status also. Any talk about practicing Christian union which blinks or obscures or denies this is absurd.

2. Our correspondent misconceives and misstates The Christian Century's position when he says, "if a convert of his [this unimmersed Christian preacher] insisted upon being sprinkled you would have the church suffer him to sprinkle the convert." This is grave misunderstanding. Our words have been positive almost to the point of dogmatism that the only way in which Christian union can be practiced in the matter of baptism is by immersion only. The point overlooked by Mr. Spayd is that the practice of Christian union is a reciprocal affair. The Disciples are not interested in encouraging anybody to come into organic union with them. They are interested in establishing a principle upon which Christian people may practice Christian union as a mutual enterprise. The preacher referred to by Mr. Spayd would be violating the basic principle of unity by sprinkling a candidate. Such a course would disunite the church at once. There is only one reason which could have induced the preacher described by Mr. Spayd to unite with the Disciples, viz., the privilege offered in their fellowship for the practice of Christian union. For him to pursue the course our correspondent indicates would be to stultify himself as well as to offend and disrupt the body of Christ.—EDITORS.]

The Book World

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE ENLIGHTENMENT. John Grier Hibben, Professor of Logic in Princeton University, is editing a series of volumes on the general topic "The Epochs of Philosophy." These volumes cover the whole field of philosophy in historical order. There are to be a round dozen of them in the series, and of these the tenth, written by the editor himself, is the first to appear. It covers the period embracing the work of Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Leibnitz, Rousseau, and Kant. The purpose of the work is to interpret the values of the philosophic tendencies which have preceded the modern period, with its rise of the critical and idealistic movements. It does not aim, of course, to be an exhaustive treatment of the subjects considered, but affords a sufficiently comprehensive interpretation of the leading philosophical movements of the eighteenth century. More than this, the modern student of philosophy who is likely to content himself with the survey of Kant and his successors, learns that whatever significance Kant may possess for the philosophical world attaches also to the period preceding his day. For this period served to open the way for the critical philosophy of the great master which is its appropriate culmination. The work is especially adapted to the needs of those who are not technical students of philosophy, for it provides in concise and readable manner a survey of the philosophical background for the religious controversies, political theories, and moral standards in England which were profoundly affected by the intellectual tendencies of the day; in France the social and political doctrines which were involved with the philosophical, and were not without a dominating influence upon the popular mind, especially through the period of the Revolution; and in Germany the influence of philosophy on theology and literature. The work is abundantly provided with references to the literature of the subject in the different countries named. (Chas. Scribner's Sons, N. Y., 1910, pp. 306, $1.50 net.)

THE NEW SOCIALISM.—Miss Jane T. Stoddart is one of the regular correspondents of The British Weekly and a writer whose painstaking accuracy and wide knowledge of current literature make her statements worth study as a reliable presentation of the themes she treats. This volume is a review of current literature on socialism, giving copious extracts from authoritative pronouncements by the leading socialists of all types and all lands in which socialism has gained headway. It deals with the rise and development of socialism, its general program in so far as this may be reduced to definite statement, the questions of compensation, inheritance, ownership and political obligation under socialism. Especially interesting are the chapters on socialism in its relation to the family and religion. Sixteen chapters present these aspects of the question. Three supplementary chapters treat of revolutionary syndicalism, recent developments of American socialism, and notes on Australian socialism. The work is, in fact, a small and convenient encyclopedia of views on socialism at the present time. (Hodder and Stoughton. New York and London, 1910, pp. 264. $1.75 net.)

ROUTLEDGE RIDES ALONE, by Will Leighton Comfort. When the Russian painter, Verestchagin, gave his wonderful paintings to the world a few years ago, there was nothing of the glory and pomp of military prowess in them,—nothing but the awful carnage and devastation that war brings. Mr. Comfort has painted a word-picture with the same underlying thought in this book, from the standpoint of the war correspondents during the time of the Russo-Japanese War. The misery of India drained to satisfy the pride and luxury of England is also vividly pictured. "War is immense and final—for the big devil-clutched souls who make it—an achievement indeed, to gather and energize and hurl this great force against an enemy, but what rotten imposition on the men who fight, not a tithe richer if they take all Asia. O, glorious Patriotism—what sins are committed in thy name." A sweet, pure thread of romance is woven throughout this story of realism. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. Pp. 310. $1.50.)

POPPY, by Cynthia Stockley. Africa has been the setting for a number of late novels and its fascination is brought out vividly by Poppy, the Irish waif, who grew up in Natal, when she comes back to Africa and her native nurse, Kykie, after a stay in Europe. "I used to sick with longing for a glimpse of the big open spaces with nothing in view but land and sky..... for the smell of the veldt, you know, when it is baking hot and the rain comes fizzling down on it; and the early morning wind, when it has blown across a thousand miles of sun-burnt grass, and little stalky, stripy veldt-flowers and stubby bushes.....and the oozy, muddy reeking, rushing rivers. Oh, Kykie, when I thought of Africa in some prim blue-and-gold continental hotel, I felt like a caged tiger cat." The book fascinates one to the end, but the men and women and happenings that fill its pages are not always wholesome. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Pp. 451. $1.35, net.)

THE UNITY OF RELIGIONS, edited by J. Herman Randall, D. D., and J. Gardner Smith. This book, consists of twenty-two chapters by as many authoritative writers. They were first given as lectures before an adult class in applied Christianity at Mount Morris Baptist Church, New York, by such scholars as President Brown of Union Theological Seminary, Andrew J. Shipman, director of the Catholic Encyclopedia, Rabbi Silverman and other of equal reputation and authority. Greek and Roman Catholicism and Socialism are a few of the subjects considered. The purpose of collecting them in one volume is expressed in the foreword, "To make more real the truth of the words, 'Religions are many, religion is one.'" (New York. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., Pp. 362. $2.00, net.)

MY RELIGION IN EVERYDAY LIFE, by Dr. Josiah Strong. Though well along in middle life, Dr. Strong is essentially an advanced thinker, and considered by many the greatest authority on what may be called religious sociology, though his utterances sometimes awaken discussion among the more conservative brethren. In his book, Dr. Strong expresses one of the underlying thoughts in the sentence, "My religion means to me loving and serving my fellowmen; not instead of loving God, but because I love God." (New York, Baker & Taylor Co., Pp. 61. 50 cents, net.)

LIFE TRANSFIGURED, by Lilian Whiting. Many quotations from ancient and modern philosophers are interspersed throughout this volume. Miss Whiting has written a number of books on similar themes which have been widely read. The aim of the book is to emphasize the reality of spiritual existence, and the relation of the everyday affairs of life to it, and to interpret the significance of the latest results in scientific research; that it is possible to live in the eternal, now and here, if one obeys the "law of righteousness," as Ruskin termed morality. (Boston: Little, Brown and Company. Pp. 310. $1.25, net.)

BETWEEN TWO REBELLIONS, by Asenath Carver Coolidge. This story revives many similar occurrences in the Civil War, where members of the same family enlisted on opposing sides. Jerry and Homer Grayson met on the field of "The Battle of the Wilderness" and gave each other the death stroke. Their father, Jeremiah Grayson, then took into his northern home, his two granddaughters, survivors of the fratricides. The writer says in the preface, "To speak plainly, man-killer is the Warrior's true name, and the sooner we cease our oblations and begin to call him by that name, the sooner will the millenial of Peace begin to come. (Watertown, N. Y., The Hungerford-Holbrook Co. Pp. 222. $1.00, postpaid.)

A MAN'S MAN, by Ian Hay. The author of this book is a described as a Scotchman with a sense of humor, which may seem a novelty to those who have the widely accepted idea that a Scotchman is lacking in an appreciation of wit,—an idea that is far from true. Mr. Hay made a reputation for himself, especially in England, in "The Right Stuff," and its successor is being looked forward to with interest. "A Man's Man" tells of the humorous happenings in an unsolicited guardianship the principals in the comedy being an athletic young Englishman and his ward, a charming self-willed girl. (Boston. Houghton, Mifflin Co. Pp. 379. $1.20, net.)

DOGS AND MEN, by Henry Merwin. We do not think Mr. Merwin had any banal motive in giving the dog the prominent place in the title of his book, but to emphasize his place in creation, expressing as he does intelligence, sagacity and love. Apropos of this last quality the author says, "Surely this capacity of the lower animals to love, not only man, but one another, is the most significant, the most deserving to be pondered, the most important in respect to their place in the universe of all the facts that can be learned about them." (Boston. Houghton, Mifflin Co. Pp. 57. 60 cents, net.)

THE WINDOW AT THE WHITE CAT, by Mary Roberts Rinehart. Those who enjoyed Mrs. Rinehart's "The Man in Tower Ten" will find this mystery story a delightful successor. The story begins with the disappearance of Allan Fleming, a well-known but not always well-esteemed politician, and is followed by that of Miss Jane Maitland, an elderly spinster. The complication continues until the last chapter, and terminates in most unexpected fashion. The most engaging humor pervades the lines, and romance is not lacking. (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Cimpany. Pp. 375. $1.50.)

TOO MANY WOMEN. To many, a book published anonymously, as is this, has the added charm of the mysterious. In this volume, Gerald Hanbury, bachelor, member of Parliament, and drawing-room favorite, writes an entertaining narrative in which the eternal feminine is discussed with alternating philosophy and frivolity. (New York. Frederick A. Stokes Co. Pp. 366. $1.25, net.)

THE SWORD MAKER, by Robert Barr. This story is laid in the same region as "Tekla," the Rhine region of Germany. Unlike many novels which depend for interest on their historical setting, the personages in this story live and move with real dash and spirit, and the love story running through its pages reaches a happy culmination. (New York. Frederick A. Stokes Co. Pp. 395. $1.25, net.)

Rainier of the Last Frontier

CHAPTER III.

"At the Cross-Roads of the Pacific."

True to her reputation for steadiness even in the lashing winds of November, the old "Hyson" sturdily cut the arc of The Great Circle and, shaking off the last clinging, shrieking head-wind under the bluffs of Kiushiu, shoved her blunt nose into the Nagasaki narrows twelve hours in front of schedule time.

She rattled out her anchor and swung around with the tide while her whole human cargo gathered to her rail to watch what to Rainier at least was a novel sight.

Back in '99 Nagasaki was a world's cross-roads and Rainier who had remained true to the packers and fed stock for fifteen days with scarce a glance at the bridge, now noted with exuberant appreciation the food awaiting his alert disciplined pencil in the crowded scene of the harbor. The green moulding of the swelling hills terraced to their tops, the nestling grey of the low-roofed city, the busy Bund at the water's edge and the harbor itself with French warships from Saigon, a Russian cruiser from Vladivostok, a whole Japanese squadron in grey paint with mystic red stripes on funnels, 'tramps' flapping Norwegian, English, German and a dozen other national trade emblems, and every otherwise unoccupied acre in the scintillating blue water decorated with jaunty little sampans zigzagging across the view.

Alaska, in a blue flannel shirt and sombrero, was puffing a pipe at Rainier's elbow, both leaning lazily over the side.

"Ever here before?" queried Rainier.

Alaska nodded a jerky assent.

"Pretty little city in a fine setting," commented Rainier generously.

"Outside's alright. Slimy on the underside," grunted the packer and proceeded to retail some social facts well known to Oriental travelers.

"Last time we came through here it broke my work up for a solid three month. I had about the same gang with me then that I got with me now. Pretty fair sort of hands. But they got tangled up in the happy streets back of the Bund yonder an' I was shawt four men when the last whistle blew. An' the men I did collect in time hed all been rolled an' gin'rally used up. I worked the sin out of 'em though, long afore they seen Corregidor. We'll hev to go through the same barbecue agin tonight."

"Why not keep the boys aboard? I overheard the first mate say we leave tomorrow early."

Alaska had resumed his pipe but pulled it out and gravely shook his head.

"No, I aint running a Baptist Sunday-school. They'll git their shore leave alright, alright. An' they ought to git it after watching their little ol' land-lubber stumicks do the broncho habit fer a fortnit. But it'll take a mighty strenuous an' enthusiastic 'coy-no-sewer' to collect 'em up."

Alaska stalked away and left Rainier watching the approaching tugs as they towed alongside several barges heaped high with sacked Japanese bituminous. As they swung into position below him he saw that the laborers swarming upon them were not men but women who under the direction of male foremen speedily built themselves into a living ladder, over whose human rungs an endless chain of burlap coal sacks soon flowed over the high sides of the transport. It was an interesting sight but Rainier was not the man to feel no disgust at the sight of a couple of hundred potential mothers and sweethearts grunting, perspiring, straining, like cattle.

He went below shortly and fell upon a pile of fresh newspapers, relieved to read that Aguinaldo was still causing the hike habit to flourish amongst General Otis' men in the Islands. It would never do to arrive at Iloilo too late to get a taste at least of that mushy little war.

In the afternoon he went ashore in a sampan loaded with an uproarious group of his Q. M. D. comrades, eager all to taste the doubtful pleasures of the port.

He watched them with misgiving.

Alaska had given them strict orders that they were to return by midnight, as the "Hyson" might steam out at any hour after that. They had all gravely promised but Rainier had himself too large an experience in the foreign ports of Europe to be other than apprehensive. A dozen glasses of cheap sailor's whiskey would render void and valueless the consecration of an apostle.

But they were an infernally cheerful lot, mainly happy-go-luckies recruited in the Rocky Mountain Belt with a Cockney and a 'Greaser' thrown in. Rainier parted with them on the wharf being anxious to go to the Consulate for news from his paper and Uncle Jimmy. It was not easy to part with them for several had taken a warm liking to the young correspondent whose story had gradually percolated through the miscellaneous society of the horse-transport.

"Stay with the bunch," urged a lanky, mild-eyed Kansan known as Kistler.

"Help us make the little brown folks sit up and take notice," grinned a cheerful stocky little Oregonian who answered to the name of "Squeeze." "A whole lot of acceleration has got to instigate this lan'scape before morning."

But he thanked them heartily and, directed by them in parting, speedily found himself at the Consulate. The consul himself was out. But the clerk handed over two cablegrams and invited him to make himself at home. Accepting a chair he read his messages with some trepidation.

The first was reassuring:

"Rainier, American Consulate, Nagasaki: Seattle Spirit claims exclusive right your stuff. Have written full Iloilo. Hartman."

Rainier sighed with pleasure. Doubtless his salary check was already in an envelope and churning across the Pacific toward his pocket. But as to the other cable, alas! 'twas a thorn in his adventurous flesh. As he read the words he could see the very face, form and gesture of the wrathful writer.

"Rainier, American Consulate, Nagasaki: Am through with you. Vagabond blood makes you impossible. Denny, Seattle."

Rainier had conscience enough to glow at the ears. He remembered quite vividly his violent arguments with excitable Uncle Jimmy. He recalled the fat smile of triumph on that pudgy relative's face when at last he had formally surrendered his chosen career. How pathetically kind his uncle had been to him. And now to rob Uncle Jimmy of the holy joy of saving him from the accursed 'wanderlust' that had possessed him ever since he had reached free twenty-one—what a deuced shame!

"If only some fair damsel would cast the golden chain of Cupid's spell around me!" he mused. "How can they expect me to become a trolley-dodger, a solid citizen, an ornament of the Chamber of Commerce, when I have nothing to ballast me but bachelor's quarters and endless miles of meal-tickets. Uncle Jimmy thinks that that strain of Indian blood in me three generations diluted predestines me to Bohemia. Well, I'd worship by the solid decade at the right shrine. I know that that's in me. So, after all, heaven is responsible that I gather no moss, not a. Amen and Amen."

Pleased with his philosophy he cashed his draft through the kindness of the clerk and the magic of a liberal discount and cabled back the single word "Thanks" to Hartman and the single word "Sorry" to Uncle Jimmy.

Then to prove the cunning of his pencil he pumped the clerk, wandered out into the streets, threaded the bazaar, rode for the first time in a rickshaw and then mailed his warm impressions of the Cross Roads of the Pacific to his paper.

This done he mingled again with the people on the streets finding them increasingly fascinating. The women, clap-clapping on their wooden clogs, carrying bundled up babies, looked as though they had streamed down off the bric-a-brac at home and so toy-like were the people as a whole that he felt a strong impulse to look in their backs for the place where they were wound up. Jinrikisha men in white mushroom hats, with their pedigree and occupation stamped in immense characters upon their blue-clad backs, shared the little twisting thoroughfares with amusing native ponies wearing straw hats. Students, with their native costume crowned by the Occidental 'derby' and incongruous behind eye-glasses, hurried by in striking contrast to the consistent costumes of the rosy-cheeked women and the swaggering cut of the everywhere present foreign sailor.

As evening settled down the charm of the shops with their quaint displays was heightened by the lighting of vast stretches of paper lanterns.

It was fully eleven-thirty before he found himself willing to leave the allurements of the city and at least twelve before the sampan manned by it's single sculler had brought him alongside the "Hyson."

He was clambering sleepily up the ship's ladder when the dry voice of Alaska came down from above.

"Stay down, son. Hold that Jap boat."

Almost instantly Alaska came down the ladder. He looked through the darkness significantly at the correspondent.

"Two of mine, three sogers and the ship's doctor missin.' An' she sails in an hour and a half."

As Alaska spoke he threw some cords into the bottom of the sampan and motioned to the owner to row to the docks. Half way to the Bund he said quietly:

"Git the sleep out of you, son. Hits up to you an' me to do most of this job tonight. Them Jap police air so light-weight that enough of 'em cain't git a hold on a white man to lift him."

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13.

Theme for the Day—The Vision of God.

Scripture—Who is like unto thee, O Jehovah, among the gods? Who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?—Ex. 15:11.

But he, being full of the Holy Spirit, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God.—Acts 7:55.

Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory upon their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us.—Psa. 90:16, 17.

Who that one moment has the least descried
Him,
Dimly and faintly, hidden and afar,
Doth not despise all excellence beside Him, Pleasures and powers that are not and that are,—

Ay amid all men bear himself thereafter
Smit with a solemn and a sweet surprise, Dumb to their scorn and turning on their laughter
Only the dominance of earnest eyes?
—F. W. H. Myers ("Saint Paul.")

Prayer—Our Father and Friend, we have seen Thy glory in the wide universe about us, and have read of Thy holiness in the writings of holy men of the past. But we desire the personal fellowship with Thee through prayer and service that we shall have a sense of Thy presence and intimacy that nothing can disturb. On this holy day we would have the spirit of worship, and in Thy house may we find the companionship in divine things that our souls require. Feed us with the bread of life, for Thy mercy's sake. Amen.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14.

Theme for the Day—Jesus' Knowledge of Men.

Scripture—But Jesus did not trust himself unto them, for that he knew all men, and because he needed not that any one should bear witness concerning man; for he himself knew what was in man.—John 2:24, 25.

No spirit in shape of light and darkness wrought,
No faith, no fear, no dream, no rapture, nought
That blooms in wisdom, nought that burns in crime,
No virtue girt and armed and helmed with light,
No love more lovely than the snows are white,
No serpent sleeping in some dead soul's tomb,
No song-bird singing from some live soul's height,
But he might hear, interpret, or illume
With sense invasive as the dawn of doom.
—Swinburne ("On the Death of Robert Browning.")

Prayer—Father of all goodness, we adore Thee for the life Thou hast given us, and for the sense of worth and power that comes with our knowledge of Jesus. In contemplating the wisdom which he ever displayed we seem to grow wiser. In viewing the calm serenity of his daily life we gain new self-control and dignity. May his character have for us the ever-growing value of an example that is not wholly beyond our reach. And may no mistake or failure discourage us in the effort to make his life our own. We ask in his name. Amen.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15.

Theme for the Day—The Changing Forms of Truth.

Scripture—I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, in the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all the truth. —John 16:12, 13.

Wherefore I shall be ready always to put you in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and are established in the present truth.—2 Pet. 1:12.

Truth fails not; but her outward forms that bear
The longest date do melt like frosty rime,
That in the morning whitened hill and plain
And is no more.
—Wordsworth ("Mutability.")

Prayer—O Lord, our God, early would we seek Thee. Our souls cry out for Thee, the living God. All things about us change with the years, but Thou remainest. From everlasting to everlasting Thou art God. Help us to prepare ourselves for the changes that life brings to us by firmer reliance upon Thine own abiding love. Help us to discern aright the new forms in which Thou givest us the truth. May we not be content with the old alone, dear and useful as it has been, but help us to seek ever the present truth, the truth for the day in which we live. For Christ the Truth's sake. Amen.

WESDESDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

Theme for the Day—Rest after Toil.

Scripture—The sleep of a laboring man is sweet.—Eccl. 5:12.

In peace will I both lay me down and sleep; for thou, Jehovah, alone makest me dwell in safety.—Psa. 4:8.

Take unto Thyself O Father,
This folded day of Thine,
This weary day of mine.
Its ragged corners cut me yet—
O still the jar and fret!
Father, do not forget
That I am tired
With this day of Thine.
—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps ("Evening Prayer.")

Prayer—Our loving Father, whether we come to Thee in the morning or the evening, or many times in the day, there is always the burden and stress of life that makes us pray for rest, And Thou hast given us assurance that we may find rest in Thee, not in idleness nor refusal, but in high obedience to Thy will, wherein all work committed to us becomes noble and good. Father save us from fretting and worry, and quiet our spirits with the smile of Thy good pleasure. In Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17.

Theme for the Day—The Happy Companionship of Heaven.

Scripture—And his servants shall serve him; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be on their foreheads.—Rev. 22: 3, 4.

And he shall wipe away every tear from their eyes: and death shall be no more; neither shall there be mourning, nor crying, nor pain, any more; the first things are passed away.—Rev. 21:4.

Through the dear might of Him that walked the waves,
In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love.
There entertain him all the saints above,
In solemn troops, and sweet societies,
That sing, and singing in their glory move,
And wipe the tears forever from his eyes.
—John Milton ("Lycidas.")

Prayer—Father of spirits, we welcome the good news of Thy holy Word that after the discipline and victory of the life that now is, we have assurance of increasing life. We crave a larger knowledge and an ampler range of work. Thou dost call us forth from the petty things that we handle here to tasks that are worthy of immortal souls. Prepare us, we beseech Thee, in the days to come, and then we shall not miss its gladness and its high companionships. For our Master's sake we ask. Amen.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18.

Theme for the Day—Love's Victory.

Scripture—And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And he said, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt.—Gen. 45:4.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you.—Matt. 5:44.

Forward, let the stormy moment fly and mingle with the Past.
I that loathed have come to love him. Love will conquer at the last —Tennyson ("Locksley Hall.")

Prayer—We have been humbled and thrilled, our Father, by the story of love so great that it could forgive and ennoble by its strength and of a confidence in the power of holiness that could bid men love even their enemies. Dear God, may we who live in far more favorable times, be at least as noble as Joseph of old in our forgiveness. And may the Master find us not unworthy of his approval in our obedience to his testing command. We would let love have its way in our hearts, and thus be like the Savior, in whose name we pray. Amen.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

Theme for the Day—The Wonder and Worth of the Human Body.

Scirpture—I will give thanks unto thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: wonderful are thy works.—Psa. 139:14.

Or know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit which is in you, which ye have from God?—1 Cor. 6:19.

I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your spiritual service.—Rom. 12:1.

Still deem thou not
Our holy Master put the body by
As though t'were clog and curse! Not mean, nor base,
But of Heaven's best upbuilding is this House,
Fashioned for man; the city of nine gates,
Wonderful, subtle, sacred;—to be kept
Fair and well garnished; graced with ornament
Outside and in, and wardened worthily
That, in its ordered precincts, Angel's wings

The Pet Kitten

Demurely sitting on the wall
Who quickly hears me when I call,
And runs to play with string and ball?
My playful kitten.

While pussy anxious watch shall keep,
Who dares upon the table leap,
Into my cup to take a peep?
My nimble kitten.

Who shyly gives my knee a tap,
Then gently jumps into my lap,
And settles down to take a nap?
My sleepy kitten.

Who, full of life, and fun, and play,
Gambols with me the livelong day,
Or mourns when I am gone away?
My loving kitten.

And when I enter at the door,
Who stands and purrs upon the floor,
And seems to think her troubles o'er?
My darling kitten.

Though many other kits I see,
And some perhaps, as gray may be,
Not one shall dare compare with thee,
My own pet kitten.

—Dumb Animals.

A Case of Telepathy

BY GRACE WOOD CASTLE.

It all came about because Mr. Denslow suddenly changed his mind. He had said during dinner that "he must go over and see Allen about that matter—it had been neglected long enough." Later when Mrs Denslow come down from putting Bobby to bed and saw nothing of her spouse she naturally concluded that he had gone, and sat down to her embroidery.

Now Mr. Denslow fully intended to go, and went so far as to open the front door to see if it were still snowing, in which case he purposed to wear his cravenette. The weather was much colder and as the icy air struck him the Allen matter suddenly seemed less important—anyhow there was no hurry; he would lie down on the couch in the library until Mary came down. The library was warm, the couch very comfortable and enough light filtered through the drawn portieres to make a semi-twilight, very conducive to repose.

Suddenly—or so it seemed to him—he was hearing voices from the sitting-room and realized that he had been asleep. His mother who lived near, had the pleasant habit of dropping in evenings using the rear entrance. One voice was hers and the other his wife's. He started to get up but his whole body protested. His business was one in which the Christmas rush had to be reckoned with and now that it was over, tiredness seemed to abide in the marrow of his bones. Anyway, it didn't matter about his listening, he thought, they were only discussing embroidery, but suddenly his mother asked: "Where's John tonight?"

"He's gone over to Mr. Allen's." There was a pause—then his mother spoke again, and her tone was embarrassed.

"Well, Mary, how do you like your new lavender crepe? John showed it to me the day before Christmas when I was in the office."

Mary's voice, too, sounded odd as she answered, "The material is very beautiful. How do you like the silk he gave you, mother?"

"It is a lovely piece of goods," she replied; then both laughed a little half-heartedly to the perplexity of the listener.

He could hardly credit his hearing when his mother said comfortingly: "You mustn't mind, dear, I don't. Of course I already have two black silks—this will make three—and I'd love to have a lavender crepe to wear to Anne's wedding, but——"

"And I'd just set my heart on a black silk suit for next spring. Oh dear, can't we exchange? I hate lavender and I don't need an evening dress now." Mary's voice trembled as she went on: "I wouldn't breathe it to any one but you, but why WILL John insist on buying me dresses? I don't need so very many—not so many as I have—but they ought to be just right. Eight of the ten Christmases since we were married he has given me dresses, and only once has it been the kind I needed."

"I know, dear," said his mother soothingly, "but we'll have to make the best of it. He means to do the right thing but he doesn't understand. His father was the same way—couldn't see that there was anything to be considered in buying a gown but beauty and durability in the material. I remember well," she went on musingly, "when John was a month old his father brought me a rose-colored silk. Oh, it was beautiful enough for a princess, and I told him so.

" 'Well, then, it's just right for you,' he said. 'You are my princess.' How could I remind him after that that my street dress was shabby, and with the extra expenses on account of the baby, would have to do another season. Besides there wasn't a place that I went in those days that a pink silk wouldn't have made me ridiculous."

"What did you do with it?" Mary asked sympathetically.

"Kept it in a drawer until Ella was old enough to have it made into a party dress. Her father didn't live to see her wear it," she added sadly as she rose to go.

"Better stay till John comes, it won't be long now, and he can go home with you," advised Mary.

"No, I told the folks I'd be home by nine; it's only a few steps."

Under cover of the noise of opening and shutting the back door Mr. Denslow tiptoed into the hall, hastily donned overcoat and hat, then opened and closed the front door noisily. His wife heard him and called hurriedly. "Don't take off your overcoat, John. Your mother has just started home and you had better go with her. I'm afraid she will slip."

"All right," he answered, "I'll go out the front way."

Ten minutes afterward he came in glowing from his short walk and looking not in the least like a man who had lately taken a nap.

"Did you settle the Allen matter?" queried Mrs. Denslow.

"Not quite," he evaded. "It will take another evening to close it up."

A few days afterward Mr. Denslow found wife and mother absorbedly studying fashions as portrayed in the latest Demonstrator.

"Hard at it?" he asked lightly.

"Yes," returned his mother, without looking up from the pictured page, where a stately white-haired lady in evening garb swept majestically. "I'm going to have my new black silk made up soon to wear to the wedding."

"Isn't it a bit somber for evening?" he asked casually. "Seems to me you ought to wear something light on the joyful occasion."

"I don't think I can afford it just now?" she said absently, "and the silk is such a beautiful piece of goods."

"Speaking of clothes," said Mr. Denslow later on at the dinner table—he was helping Bobby to pudding as he spoke and seemed almost to forget what he had begun to say—"speaking of clothes, Mary, I saw your friend Mrs. Gardiner today wearing a black silk suit that was certainly fetching."

"Yes, they're the thing now," she replied, "I knew she was having it made."

"Now, I have an idea,"— he spoke as if he had that moment acquired it—"Mary, why don't you two exchange dress patterns—or don't you like lavender, mother?"

"I adore it," she said eagerly," and I never had a lavender thing in my life."

"Oh, wouldn't you really mind, John?" excitedly asked his wife.

"Certainly not, why should I? If you are both suited, I'm sure I am. Lucky I thought of it."

Later Mrs. Denslow grew suspicious.

"You're sure you didn't say anything to John about our talk, mother," she said anxiously.

"Never a word, dear. Are you sure YOU didn't?"

"Perfectly sure," she affirmed. "The subject was never mentioned."

"Well, then, it must be a case of telepathy or thought-transference that the magazines are so full of lately," said the elder lady. "I've always thought there was something in it and now I'm sure. I've known John Denslow ever since he was born and he never thought of that all by himself. I'm certain of that, so the only explanation is that the idea passed from your mind to his, somehow."

"If that's the case," said Mrs. Mary cheerfully, "I think I'll begin now to concentrate my mind on the thought of a brown traveling bag with silver trimmings for next Christmas."

May float and fold; and body help the soul
As soul helps body.

—Edwin Arnold ("The Love of God and Man.")

Prayer—Holy and righteous art Thou, O Lord, and in Thine own image hast Thou fashioned us that we should render Thee a service worthy of Thyself, and at last attain to Thine eternal companionship. We stand in wonder at the house of flesh in which we dwell. How manifold is Thy wisdom displayed in its building. Inspire us with a fine reverence for it which shall save us from all sin against it, and shall give us a desire to help and heal our fellowmen, even as did our Lord. And in his name we pray. Amen.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Wine Press of Sorrow.

Gethsemane may well be called the wine-press of human sorrow, for there were passed the most agonizing moments in the life of our Lord. The prophet of old had put into the mouth of the coming redeemer of Israel, who appeared from the hated land of Edom drenched in the blood of his enemies, the significant word, "I have trodden the wine-press alone" (Isa. 63:7.) In that prophetic oracle there was contained all the pent-up hope that when the deliverer of the nation finally should come, he might take vengeance on those fierce Edomites across the Dead Sea for the cruelties they had visited upon the frontiers of Israel.

But Christian reflection upon the words of holy Scripture has delighted to read in this sanguinary oracle of ancient Israel a deeper and more sympathetic meaning. It was inconceivable that Jesus should accept the bloody program of revenge upon the foes of ancient Israel. In fact those foes had long since perished from the earth. It was therefore natural to perceive in the winepress a figure representing not the place of the slaughter of Israel's enemies, but the place where the grapes of divine wrath upon sin must be trodden out by some one great enough to accept the challenge of evil when there was no other to respond. In this sense at least, of solitary conflict with evil which hitherto had been too great for human strength, our Savior trod the winepress alone. And in the sorrows of Gethsemane the words seeem to find their complete and tragic meaning.

The Olive Garden.

The Passover feast had been completed by Jesus and the disciples. They had sung the psalms appropriate to the night, and passed out from the upper room of their communion into the glorious beauty of a Passover night in Jerusalem, when the moon was at the full and the whole wonderful vision of walls, palaces, winding streets and distant hills lay under the enchantment of the spring at midnight. Down from the place of their meeting in the upper city they came to one of the southern gates, and then passed out into the gardens that lay without the walls, and down still further into the ravine of the Kidron . Then they slowly mounted a familiar path to a spot very dear to our Lord, where he had spent much time in other days both alone and with the disciples.

The word "Gethsemane" means the "oil press," and this term probably refers to a spot of ground where there was an olive orchard and a press used for the production of the olive oil, which was such a common and necessary article of household use in Palestine. Perhaps some friend of Jesus owned the ground, so that he felt free to resort thither whenever he wished the relief of quietness within easy reach of the crowded city. He had gone there sufficiently often so that the disciples recognized it as a familiar spot. And Judas knew that he would find the Master there when he wished to betray him.

The Disciples at Gethsemane.

There are two sites of Gethsemane now pointed out on the slopes of the Mount of Olives. One is the Greek garden where the gorgeous and garish chapel has been erected by a Russian of royal blood. The other is the Franciscan garden, revered by all Roman Catholics as the scene of the agony. It is kept with exquisite care by the Franciscan Fathers, and a number of old olive trees which may be as much as a century old are carefully tended, along with the lovely flowers which are arranged in the precise lines of a florist's care. Of course no one knows that either of these spots is the actual scene of our Saviour's night of prayer. The strife over precise spots in Palestine has been pathetic and often tragic. The Greek and Roman churches are forever disputing the localities where events in the life of Christ took place. And this very strife has had a tendency to to make the identification of sacred places a matter of only secondary and superficial concern to those who try to enter with sympathy into the experience of our Lord.

Indeed it was sympathy which Jesus craved on the night of his betrayal. He took the disciples with him to the garden, all save Judas, who had gone his way to consummate his sinister design. Jesus longed for the companionship of his disciples as the hour of his deepest sorrow drew on. He left most of them near the entrance of the garden, it would seem, and took Peter, James and John into the further depts of the silent place. Probably the fact that they had often accompanied Jesus thither made them less sensitive to any change in his attitude that night. All he had said to them concerning the dark days ahead had left them unimpressed with his own deep sadness and apprehension of coming sufferings. So they went easily and swiftly to sleep. And he more and more depressed by the accumulation of shadow of the great olive trees, bowed himself in such an agony as nowhere else, not even at the Cross, came upon him.

The Divine Sorrow.

Our narratives of this somber experience in the life of Jesus come to us from the three synoptic Gospels. It is clear that Matthew follows closely the older narrative of Mark. Luke adds the items of the assisting angel and the bloody sweat. John alone of the evangelists is silent on this solemn experience of our Lord. Is that silence significant as the mark of his hesitance in the presence of the profound grief of the Master? Perhaps this beloved disciple found it impossible to attempt any description of a scene through which, at the very nadir of human experiences, Jesus passed with bowed head and trembling limbs. There are some scenes too sacred for the deepest love to dwell upon.

And what was that agony which came upon our Master in that tragic hour? Surely it was no timid fear of death. The saints and martyrs of all the ages have faced the tortures of the arena, the fagot and the cross with no sign of flinching. And Jesus, the Master in all things, was not less brave than they. Even so, one must not forget that the delicacy of his physical organism must have made suffering far more acute and dreadful than in the experience of a less sensitive nature. But it was not the apprehension of pain that brought him low.

The Tragedy of Evil.

Was it the shame to which he was so soon to be subjected? The contemplation of public mockery and derision, the knowledge of the awful cruelties to which the victims of judicial punishment were subjected before the populace, the knowledge that he would be stripped and lifted before the world in the most acute publicity of shameful exposure, must have weighed heavily upon his soul in that hour.

But this was only the outward approach to the real citadel of his agony. For in that hour all the sufferings that human sin had wrought, all the disaster's and grim tragedies of the souls of men, seemed rolled upon him in a flood tide that all but overwhelmed him. The treachery of Judas, the malice of the chief priests, the callous unawareness of the disciples, the brutal subserviency of the populace, and the loneliness of his own redemptive effort to meet and stem this awful tide of human delinquency, staggered even his heroic soul. In that moment it was as if he who knew no sin was actually becoming sinful in behalf of his brethren. He was bearing the ills and sickness of the world. In him the prophetic word was becoming real—"Himself bear our sins."

The Supreme Question.

Then, too, there was the final torturing question—Would it all avail? How could he be sure that after the great sacrifice had been made, the world might not pass by on the other side, unheeding and unconcerned? He was treading the winepress alone. He was draining the chalice of human sin and suffering. Would his brethren know or care? Would even the utmost that he could do as the Son of God avail to turn the careless and self-satisfied world to penitence and the life of holiness?

And thus, in the struggle which is but dimly reflected in our sources, the Savior passed the bitter hours of that awful night. Again and again he returned to the spot where he had left the disciples, only to find them sleeping and forgetful. Perhaps for a moment they were roused by his coming and his speech, but they did not understand, and soon fell again to slumber and left him to fight the battle alone. And when at last the struggle was ended and Jesus had conquered himself with divine subhission to the Father's will, he spoke the word of profound sympathy and comprehension of their human weakness, "Sleep on and take your rest. The conflict is passed, the struggle is ended, I know the way I am to take."

Later, when the moon had sunk and the dawn was deepening in the sky, a flare of torches at the garden entrance warned Jesus that the hours of his solitude were past, the supreme moment had come. He roused the disciples with the words, "Arise, we must be going, for he that betrays me is at hand."

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

How Does God Want to be Thanked?
Ps. 100:1-5.
(Thanksgiving Meeting)
TOPIC NOVEMBER 20.

Notice the statement of the subject: How does God want to be thanked? There are different ways of thanking the Lord. What way or ways are acceptable to him? Some ways, then, are not acceptable to him. No doubt we would all be surprised if we realized how much of our thanksgiving to the Lord is little more than mockery to the Lord.

In the last analysis there is only one kind of thanksgiving which the Lord rejects—a heartless thanksgiving. But the astonishing thing for us to learn is how much of our thanksgiving is heartless. The Christian Endeavorer who goes through this meeting mechanically, reading a selection of scripture, or a clipping from a paper, or offering a sentence of prayer, i. e., with no meditation on the goodness and grandeur of the God whom he is praising, with no personal appreciation of his care and providence of his own life, speaks idle words, his thanksgiving is heartless. May none of us be guilty!

But if we believe that God is, that He "hath made us, and we are His," that "we are His people and the sheep of His pasture," and that all we are in mind and heart, our ability to appreciate the good, the true, and the beautiful; that he clothes us, and feeds us, and shelters us, and surrounds us with friends tried and true, and because of all this and much more which we cannot mention, speak and sing his praises from a full and overflowing heart, God hears our prayer and praise and is pleased to bless us for the gratitude of our hearts. Such was the Psalmist's feeling in our lesson. He believed that "his loving kindness" was given to him, and to all generations and he, therefore, admonished all nations to "make a joyful noise unto Jehovah."

But let us not deceive ourselves; there remains still another test as to whether our praises be heartfelt or merely a lip service. It is relatively easy for us to join enthusiastically with a hundred others in the singing of some hymn of praise or even in meditating upon God's goodness. But are we ready to "serve him with gladness"? That is to do things with a good courage and a light heart. This service may consist of any sort of good work—a committee service in the society, or the assumption of some duty suggested by the pastor in the larger work of the church—the teaching of a class, acting as usher, serving on a finance committee or on the board of deacons. Calls to service of whatever kind, are to be considered as opportunities which are accepted not with reluctance, hesitation, or in a bad humor, but willingly, heartily, gladly. We, all of us, count it a privilege to render a service to our best and most esteemed friends, and many a time we have gone far out of the way of our personal convenience to render such a service, and at the same time had great pleasure in performing the act of kindness. Will your thanksgiving to God stand this test?

Then there is a larger service which we must render to the helpless and the needy which are about us. The crippled, the poor, the criminal, and the orphan are open-door opportunities which stand before us constantly. Do we, with gladness, lend our aid? Perhaps so. But there is still another form of service—the winning of others to Christian service and character. There are seventeen million young men in this land—the majority of whom are not in the churches. The father heart of God longs for them. Are we adding our might for their redemption, and are we doing it with gladness? If we can affirm all this, then we are giving a heartfelt gratitude to God. Our thanksgiving is acceptable.

Woman's Missionary Jubilee

BY MRS. MARIE V. BOWMAN.

[We regret that the following article was received too late for publication last week. Many Chicago readers receive their papers on Wednesday, however, and will give immediate heed to the privileges of this interesting gathering.—EDITORS.]

This year marks the fiftieth anniversary of the organized beginning of woman's work for Foreign Missions in America. What the fifty years have meant to Foreign Missions is a most interesting subject for our retrospection, but more interesting still, and more fruitful toward the future of that work is it to inquire what the years have brought to woman herself, and in what measure they have furnished her forth more fully to go into the next fifty years, which will see the whole world evangelized, the centuries old commission fulfilled, and the nations brought under the unifying influence of the Christian religion.

We will celebrate inter-denominationally in Chicago during the two days, Wednesday November 9th, and Thursday November 10th, this significant anniversary.

Let every woman who has an interest in the world-wide extension of the blessed religion which has brought woman into her own estate and has given her the high and privileged position which she holds today, lay aside every other duty and arrange her daily affairs so that she may meet with others and fitly remember what the years have brought her in opportunities, and recount the wonderful blessings of God in giving great results to her endeavors in the half century.

Retrospecting in the wonderful past and heartening for the glorious future are to be the order of the days. On Wednesday afternoon a lecture by Dr. Summer E. Vinton, profusely illustrated by the stereopticon, will be given at Orchestra Hall at 2:15 p. m. Tickets may be obtained at your church or at Orchestra Hall the day of the lecture. In the evening at 8 o'clock mass meetings will be held, one in each division of the city; that for the North Side at Wesley Methodist Church, the South side meting at the 41st Street Presbyterian and the West side at Park Ave. Methodist. A mass meeting of the Union of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions will be held at the First Methodist Church, corner of Clark and Washington Streets, beginning at 8 o'clock which will prove a great occasion for the women of our own auxiliaries and their friends. It is expected that the men of the church will join in this mass meeting which has been placed as an evening service in order that they may have a part in the celebration of the jubilee.

The National Board has sent Miss Florence Miller to speak at this meeting, and in addition to Miss Miller's address there will be short talks by Dr. Willett and other friends, which, added to good music and good cheer, will make a most happy and inspiring occasion.

On Thursday morning a drawing room conference will be held for invited guests with the intention of interesting many women of the church not now allied with the missionary movement.

The next item of program deserves particular atteneion. It has been planned to have a thousand women sit down and partake of luncheon together at the Auditorium Hotel at one o'clock on Thursday, and it is hoped that a spirit of most helpful fellowship will pervade this meeting.

Mrs. Helen Montgomery, who is a most charming speaker, will give a short talk and others will respond to toasts. The places at this luncheon are rapidly being taken up and it will be necessary to let your auxiliary president know at once if you wish to have a part in this, one of the most throughly enjoyable occasion of the jubilee. Every missionary woman is invited.

Moody Church, corner of Chicago Ave. and La Salle St. will conclude the jubilee celebration, at which Mrs. Montgomery, Miss Miller, Dr. Mary Noble, Mrs. W. T. Elmore, Miss Harriet Taylor, and many other great missionary leaders will give an appreciation of the fifty years of woman's missionary work.

Let us lay aside everything else for these two days and give ourselves as Christian women to the gaining of a new vision of the great and wonderful work which God has called us to do, and in which he has so signally blessed us and our efforts.

—The national conference of Catholic charities, the purpose of which is to promote the aims of the Catholic church in the field of charity, was inaugurated in Washington last week in the presence of high ecclesiastical dignitaries, including Cardinal Gibbons, Mgr. Falconio, apostolic delegate, archbishops and bishops, and nearly 500 laymen and clergymen identified in the work of charity. The practical mission of the conference was to bring about exchange of views among experienced Catholic men and women active in the work of charity, to collect and publish information concerning organization, problems and results in Catholic charity, to bring to expression a general policy towards distinctive modern questions, and to encourage further development of a literature in which the religious and social ideals of charity shall find dignified expression.

—England cannot be called a country of paupers, but the pauper question is a very serious one. On June 25 last, according to the official statistics, the number of paupers in receipt of relief in England and Wales was 762,111. Of these, 260,449 were what are called "indoor" paupers, and 501,662 "outdoor" paupers." This makes a ratio of pauperism of 21 per thousand of population. In London itself are about 116,000 paupers receiving relief every day. Poverty is in evidence in that city, for it makes no attempt to hide itself. As a correspondent says, "The poverty of these people is obviously real, and one can guess their hunger. They do not beg, but shuffle listlessly through the streets. In winter they recruit the bands of hunger marchers that tramp through the gutters of the chief shopping thoroughfares, especially during the month preceding Christmas.

Edward Wright, pastor at Woodlawn, Ore., has received a call from his congregation to remain with them indefinitely. Samuel Gregg has just closed a meeting there.

At a special service held recently at church at Ocean Park, Cal., where J. L. Lobingier ministers, $1,200 was subscribed, a sum sufficient to cover the entire indebtedness.

The church at Napa, Cal., has been removed to another location. Improvements, adding particularly to the Sunday-school facilities, will be made at a cost of $5,500.

C. L. DePew, state superintendent of Illinois Sunday-schools, spoke at both morning and evening services at First Church, Mt. Sterling, Ill.

C. C. Wilson, of Bellefontaine, O., closed his work there on Oct. 30, having accepted the unanimous call of the congregation of First Church, Milwaukee.

The congregation at Riverside, Cal., is laying foundations for a new building. Charles R. Moore is in charge of the work there.

The adult classes of the Tacoma Sunday-schools are in a contest to continue until the first of the year. The prizes are three round-trip tickets to San Francisco.

A successful meeting has just closed at Second Church, Terre Haute, Ind. Charles E. McVay, who had charge of the music, is now in a meeting at Clay Center, Neb.

W. A. Moore, of First Church, Tacoma, Wash., spends one day in the week with the laboring men in the South Tacoma shops, giving addresses on present day problems.

The church at Hogman, Wash., where U. G. Miller ministers, recently raised $1,630 in a few minutes. This leaves the church clear of indebtedness.

Wm. Bayard Craig, of Lenox Avenue Church, New York, began a series of Sunday evening lectures on Oct. 30, on the theme "How We Got Our Bible."

At its meeting in Bushnell, Ill., Oct. 8, the Third District Board re-employed J. D. Williams, of Macomb, and in appreciation of his work. raised his salary $100.

C. C. Wilson formerly pastor at Bellefontaine, O., was a caller at The Century office on his way to Milwaukee, where he has accepted the pastorate of First Church.

L. W. Spayd, who has resigned his pastorate at Franklin, Ill., has removed to Arkansas, where he will make his future home. His successor has not yet been appointed.

The congregation of First Church, Joliet, Ill., have called John A. Jackson, of Ligonier, Ind., to their pulpit. Mr. Jackson began his pastorate there on Oct. 30.

M. H. Kendall, pastor at McMinnville, Ore., uses the Sunday-school lesson for his subject in the morning service. This plan is meeting with favor in a number of places.

Many Easterners are settling at Forest Grove, Ore., and E. V. Stivers, pastor of our church there, reports encouraging gains in the membership and attendance.

A union mass meeting for men was held at the Urichsville, O., church, Oct. 30. A. S. Gregg gave an address on "Bad Citizens" in connection with the work of the National Reform Bureau.

Davis Errett has closed his seventh year of service at Salem, Ore. During this time, 795 have been added with a net increase of 495, and more than $25,000 has been raised and expended.

A. R. Adams takes up the work at Saginaw, Mich., with a good prospect for service.

The congregation at Coldwater, Mich., has recently purchased a lot, and look forward to a new church home. W. R. Cady is pastor there.

The congregation of First Church, Streator, Ill., were entertained recently by Dr. David Paulson, of Chicago, who spoke on "Conservation of Health," giving a practical talk on temperance and sanitary matters.

At the recent dedication of the handsome new church at Paris, Mo., Z. T. Sweeney and J. H. Garrison conducted the dedicatory services. The sum of $12,000 was raised at this service.

A mass meeting was held in First Church, Huntington, Ind., on Oct. 30, its object being to project an organization to carry on the Laymen's Missionary Movement in Huntington county.

A series of meetings are being conducted at Augusta, Ill., by E. J. Lampton, of Louisiana, Mo. Mr. Lampton preached at this church forty-four years ago, and later was its pastor for seven years.

Charles W. Fairbanks was the principal speaker at the rally day at Central Church, Indianapolis, Ind., Nov. 6. Elaborate preparations were made for the day and a large audience was present.

R. D. Smith, of Corsicana, Tex., has been in a meeting at Central Church, Fort Worth, Tev., with the pastor, J. S. Dunn. Mr. Dunn will assist in a meeting at Corsicana at the beginning of the new year.

The congregation of Fifth Street Church, Waco, Tex., where E. L. Crystal ministers, is making progress in all its departments. They expect to erect a new building next spring.

F. P. Arthur, state secretary of Michigan, has visited a number of churches over the state recently, Glendora, Detroit, Ionia, Haire, Luther and Grand Rapids, being among the number.

During the month of October there were eighteen additions to the church at Boulder, Colo. The pastor, A. L. Ward, has been emphasizing the need of evangelistic work, and a response is already felt.

Large audiences are attending the evangelistic services being held at Maysville, Ky., by R. H. Crossfield and J. E. Sturgis. A series of Sunday-school conferences are also being held in connection with the meeting.

The congregation at Milton, Ore., now numbers over 500, and is a living-link in both Home and Foreign Societies. C. H. Hilton has resigned after a most successful pastorate, to accept a call to Klamath Falls, Ore.

Several classes of the Sunday-school of Central Church, Jacksonville, Ill., have combined to raise funds to enable Miss Eudora Shorbridge to complete a course at Eureka College, after which she will go to Africa as a missionary.

October 30 was rally day at Carbondale, Ill., where Adam K. Adcock is the recently installed minister. All the Sunday-schools in the city observed this date, the Disciples having the largest attendance—400 present, with an offering of $25.61.

The congregation at Leeton, Mo., though numbering only fifty, have just completed a substantial church home at a cost of about $3,000. An amount sufficient to cover the remaining indebtedness was subscribed at a recent service.

The church at Eaton, Ind., has lately been enlarged and remodeled throughout, new equipment for the Sunday-school and social rooms having been added, until the building now ranks favorably with many city churches.

The meetings held at Second Church, Bloomington, Ill., by the pastor, S. H. Zendt, assisted by H. A. Browning, have been productive of much good, the whole congregation giving its united support, with awakened interest on the part of all in attendance.

The congregation at Caldwell, Idaho, shows progression in the erection of a parsonage. This is manifestly the right thing to do, for since ministers can not usually own their homes, the churches owe it to them to give the best possible substitute for one.

Andrew Scott, of Danville, Ill., is in a meeting at Gifford, Ill. Much interest is manifested in the services, and many are unable to find room in the church. Sixteen were added to the membership during the first three services.

James Small is in a meeting at Danville, Ky., with H. C. Garrison, whi has been minister there for eleven years. Many new members have been added and the Sunday-school has the largest enrolment in th history of the church.

O. H. King is doing progressive work at Everett, Wash. When their new building is completed, they will have a property valued at $19,000 in a splendid location. A strong movement to rid this town of saloons is now under way.

Much regret is felt by the congregation at Nevada, Mo., in the resignation of W. W. Burks, who has occupied the pastorate for five years. Mr. Burks has been a true spiritual leader here, and the church is now one of the largest in Southwest Missouri. It has also become a living link on the foreign field.

A meeting of the Disciples of New York was held Nov. 1, at the Lenox Avenue Church, in the interest of mission work in that city. C. R. Stauffer, of Syracuse, N. Y., Joseph Keevil, A. S. Vance, M. M. Ammunson, W. L. Fisher, and the pastor, Wm. B. Craig were on the program.

In view of the November election, the Sunday-schools of Liberty, Mo., participated in a prohibition parade recently. Robert Graham Frank, our pastor there, is taking an active interest in the temperance movement, and recently delivered a sermon on the subject, "The Classes of Men Who Ought to Vote for Statewide Prohibition."

Much interest is being manifested in the meeting in progress at Lovington, Ill. The whole church membership is enlisted in the work under the evangelist, Mr. Lockhart. Mr. and Mrs. Tuckerman have charge of the singing and conduct Bible drills during the afternoon.

First Church, Mt. Sterling, Ill., is conducting interesting and helpful midweek services. The value of the different professions represented in the church are discussed, talks being given by laymen. This congregation is growing and progressing under the leadership of A. L. Cole, who has just begun his second year's work, and now numbers 425 members.

The work at Puyallup, Wash., moves along encouragingly under the pastorate of M. R. Ely. An effort is now being made to raise an indebtedness of $700. Mr. and Mrs. Ely held a month's meeting at Orting, Wash., resulting in the gathering together of a congregation of thirty-nine members. A. O. Hershaw is now carrying on the work there.

J. J. Lowe, of Philadelphia, who is carrying on an evangelistic campaign among the children and young people in connection with the Chapman-Alexander meetings, held meetings last week in Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago. Mr. Lowe is a firm believer in the ability of young people to act intelligently in regard to religious matters, without the aid of melodramatic effort.

There have been seven additions to the membership of Central Church, Warren, O., since the installation of their new pastor, F. N. Calvin. This is the ideal revival, as the new members, coming in a few at a time throughout the year, are assimilated by the church and find their place in the activities of the work of the various departments of church life.

In order to erect a building in which service can be held by the members of Swope Parkway Church, Kansas City, Mo., during the winter, ministers and laymen donned their working clothes last week to serve as carpenters, in response to a call for volunteers in all the Disciple congregations of the city. Since last May, the services of the church have been held in a tent.

Jackson Street Church, Muncie, Ind., has a well-trained chorus choir of about thirty members. Recently they gave a recital at the church which was well attended and enjoyed by the music-lovers of the city. There is no better stimulus for the interest of the young people of a congregation than an organization of this sort, where beautiful, uplifting music may be studied, and at the same time effective service rendered to the church.

The Austin (Chicago) Church, George A. Campbell, minister, reports the best congregations in its history. There have recently been about twetny-five baptisms, without a special meeting. This church is taking active part in the Chapman-Alexander evangelistic campaign, Austin, having been selected as the "center" for the West Side, where Mr. Chapman will preach in a huge tabernacle. Recently Mr. Campbell's people surprised him with a large gathering at his home and the presentation to himself and Mrs. Campbell of a purse of gold.

Hiram College has the distinction of being one of three colleges having a separate department for missionary training. This department was added to meet the demand for specially trained missionary leaders in both home and foreign field. Dr. Harry C. Hurd is director of this department and Mr. Li, a native of China, and a brilliant scholar, teaches Chinese to volunteers for service in China. Many missionaries direct from the field are secured to lecture in this department. The volunteer band has secured several new members this year. Three of last year's graduates have entered their fields. Mr. and Mrs. Vanneter have gone to Porto Rico, and Miss Mayme Jackson is in India. The band is planning a living link campaign for this year.

Leon Myers, pastor at Dallas, Ore., recently gave public answer to an address of a former mayor, who represents the saloon interests in the campaign. Mr. Myers gave a keen analysis of the mayor's address, proving many of his statements false and showing the error of his arguments. At the close of his address he asked for an expression from the crowd which had filled the capacity of the court house to hear him. The audience was unanimous in its decision that the argument for the liquor interests had been defeated, and as an expression of good will, subscribed $125 for the prohibition campaign fund. The temperance issue has now reached a point where all who stand for Christianity and the betterment of mankind must use their influence and votes for the overthrow of the political organizations that further the spread of this evil, which is always a barrier to the enlightenment and progression of the individual and the nation.

J. P. Lucas closed his work as pastor of the church at Tingley, Iowa, two weeks ago. Mr. Lucas has held pastorates with such churches as Colorado Springs, Colo., Emporia, Kansas, Bedford, Centerville, Creston and Tingley, Iowa, and has been successful in protracted meeting work. He served as chaplain of the Colorado State Penitentiary four years, out of which experience has grown an instructive lecture upon "Crime—Its Cause and Cure." Our churches will do well to keep Mr. Lucas busy in lecture work or in evangelistic meetings, and no church now without a pastor will make a mistake by calling him to its pastorate.

At the Sunday evening services at East End Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., John Ray Ewers, is telling "A Story of Human Life." One part is told at each service, and the chapters are as follows: The Start—One Kind of a Boy; Proving His Heroic Temper; Finding a Friend; Blushing Honors Fall Thick Upon Him; The Killing Frost—A Black Sin and What Came of It. This is to be the true life narrative of a famous man, and Mr. Ewers in a graphic announcement says "All who possess red-blood and thrilling nerve will surely be interested in this big-hearted man who loved, hated, toiled, played, suffered, enjoyed, had ambitions, faced disappointments, fought and won (and also lost), gained a kingdom and nearly lost his soul—and thus was one of our kind."

Hamilton College opened its 42nd annual session with an unusually large enrollment. Two hundred and ninety-nine students are registered in all departments, the largest increase being in those coming from distant states. Especially gratifying is the enthusiasm shown toward the new two years' extension of the course, 67 students already having elected to take studies therein. Among the various student activities none are more flourishing than the Y. W. C. A. with over 100 members and the four large Mission Study Classes. Hamilton College is a Living Link, Miss Kate Galt Miller, a former member of her faculty being her representative in China, and the College co-operating with the rest of the University in her support. A recent canvas of the student body showed that all but eight are members of some Christian church.

An interesting item which has heretofore escaped our columns is the dedication of a new church at Ord, Neb., on Sept. 18, by William Oeschger, Chancellor of Cotner University. E. L. Kechley began his pastorate there less than two years ago when the conditions were far from encouraging, the services being held in an old frame building. During an evangelistic meeting nearly a hundred were added to the membership, and a campaign was then started for a new building, which resulted in the erection of the present edifice, which is modern in all its equipment, and with a seating capacity of 500. At the dedicatory services, it was necessary to raise $1,100, and the congregation gave hearty response by subscribing over $1,700. Ord is located in Central Nebraska, in the North Loup River valley and with its location, equipment and the progressive leadership of Mr. Kechley, it is capable of a great work.

C. C. Dobbs, of Longmont, Colo., will begin a meeting Nov. 19, at First Church, Ft. Collins, Colo., assisting Charles Wm. Dean, the minister there. Later Mr. Dean will hold a meeting in the Longmont Church. In the weekly bulletin, published by the church, Mr. Dean has a short editorial on "Pastoral Evangelism," from the standpoints of practicability and dignity, saying in part, "Our age has a weakness for numbers and many evangelists are called great because they have reaped a large number of additions. We may never despise quantity but we must always strive to remember quality. No number can be too great if they be wholly surrendered to the will of Christ. But no greater calamity can befall a church than to have an unconverted crowd pour into its membership. The pastoral evangelist will avoid this because he knows that ten men who have been won to Jesus Christ are of more real permanent value in building the kingdom of God than a hundred who have been attracted by some fervid oratory or 'catchy' evangelism."

District of Columbia Notes

At a special meeting of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church of Washington, D. C., held September 1, 1910, the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "That the recommendation of the Board of Officers of said church passed at a meeting of said board held August 2, 1910, recommending that said church call Earle Wilfley as pastor of the said church in addition to the present pastor, Dr. F. D. Power, it being understood that Mr. Wilfley is to have charge of the active work of the pastorate of the church, both to have the designation of pastor." Mr. Wilfley has accepted the call and will supply the pulpit November 6, 1910, and thereafter. He will probably not be able to enter fully upon his duties until December 1.

H. F. Lutz, evangelist of the American Christian Missionary Society, is in a good meeting with Walter F. Smith at the Whitney Avenue Church. Thirty-seven additions have been reported.

C. S. Ehlers has been holding a short meeting at Fifteenth Street. He reported five confessions during the meeting and five just before. The meeting was held with a view of arousing interest in a later evangelistic campaign at that church under the leadership of Mr. Lutz.

Hiram's General Secretary

On August 1, 1910, the efficient pastor of the Aetna Street Church of Cleveland, Ohio, F. D. Butchart, became the general secretary of Hiram College. Mr. Butchart is a native of Ontario and an alumnus of Hiram College, having been graduated in the class of 1902. For two years after graduation he was pastor of the historic church at Chagrin Falls. Thence he was called to the pastorate of the Aetna Street Church—a pastorate of six years ended by the call to his present work. His ministry at Aetna Street was exceedingly fruitful. Nor was it limited to his own congregation. He was a close student of the social problems of the city, and freely gave time and strength in co-operation with various agencies working for social uplift.

Of Interest to Every Reader

The Publishers of The Christian Century wish to hear, at once, from people of any age or occupation in all parts of the country who can give a part of their time, if not all of it, to the easy and agreeable work of soliciting subscriptions for this paper.

Pastors of churches can supplement their salaries as well as strengthen their church's life .by placing The Christian Century in the homes of their people.

Laymen and Energetic Women can make from $25 to $100 in 60 days by putting intelligence and vigor into the work we will outline for them—They can do this without giving up their regular employment for a day.

Ladies Aid Societies, Young People's Societes, wide-awake S. S. classes can put money into their treasuries faster and easier than by Rummage Sales, Bazaars and Oyster Suppers.

It is Easy Work.

It is Grateful Work.

Your success strengthens the church as much as a Revival.

From the hundreds of congratuatory letters recently sent us we select this representative statement from a widely known and loyal pastor: "I am coming to feel that The Christian Century has come to the Kingdom for such a time as this. It is high time that utterance should be given to an outspoken, prophetic message, and I am glad that it is coming through the pages of your paper."

sion of the Christian College. He recognizes that its work is fundamental; that to it chiefly the churches must look for leaders in every phase of Christian work; that it inspires and trains for leadership not only ministers and missionaries, but also Christian business men, lawyers, doctors, farmer, teachers, mothers. In his visits to the churches it will be the purpose of Mr. Butchart to acquaint them with the work our colleges are doing; to awaken and cultivate among our people a vital interest in our own schools; especially to win friends for Hiram College and to strengthen the bonds of sympathy between the College and the churches; and to inspire and direct young people toward a college education.

Foreign Society Notes

Dr. Hardy left Kuling, China, for the Tibetan border on September 9. His journey will be shortened and he will be able to reach Batang in three months on account of being able to take a launch instead of a house boat for some of the distance.

A. L. Shelton and wife will leave Batang for America on their furlough about the first of November.

Alexander Paul of Wuhu, China, has been very low with typhoid fever. The last report is that he is improving.

Eight baptisms are reported from Tokyo, Japan for the last two weeks of September.

A large number of new mission study classes are being organized using Bolenge and Breaking Down Chinese Walls as text books.

One of the Bible-school Front Rank requirements is missionary education in the schools. The Foreign Society has a large illustrated booklet on Missionary Education in the Sunday-school. It will be sent free on application.

George T. Walden of Australia, writes: "Brother Rains has come and gone, his visit has been a delightful experience to us all. If you knew how much Australia needed moisture you will appreciate the allusion when I say that bountiful "Rains" have come to us during the last few days. We are all unanimous in saying that he has been a great uplift to us. He is so full of sunshine, so wonderfully optimistic, and with all and best of all, so full of Foreign Missionary enthusiasm! It did not matter where we put him down for a speech, it was always foreign missions.

Leonard Golo, of Brisbane, Australia, writes: "Now just a word for the "Intelligencer." We just endorse all the good opinions we see from others. Without a doubt it is one of the most interesting journals we have seen. We cannot tell you how we appreciate and look for the coming of the paper each month. We read it from cover to cover, it is so helpful and interesting, while its cheapness is a thing to marvel at."

American Mission Notes

The Mission Prayer Cycle topic in our Sunday-schools for November 13 is: "The Consecration of Our Possessions to Christ's Service."

God has richly blest us all. But we are stewards only of the things which He has entrusted to us. Are we using these possessions in His service as He would have us?

W. C. Prewitt, state superintendent of Bible-schools of New York writes: "Opportunities are pressing upon us. One of the greatest of these is Bible-school Day for American Missions, November 20. It is an opportunity to increase our attendance, to vary and brighten our program, and to effectually contribute toward sending the gospel to the needy in our own state and in our own land. The school that fails to make the best offering possible will miss a great blessing."

For the month of October, Wm. N. Vickers of Erie, Pa., reports two additions by baptism and eight by letter or statement.

W. C. Wade has recently begun work under the American Christian Missionary Society at Waynesboro, Pa.

Whether the class banks are used or the exercise is rendered in full or not, let every school have a statement made of the great needs of America as a mission field and an offering taken accompanied by definite prayer for the Home Land on Bible-school Day for American Missions, November 20.

One of our good brethren says: "While we sing, 'As Goes America, so goes the World,' what are we doing to make America the proper standard of the world. If America is to set the standard for the world in Christian belief and Christian living, we should begin to emphasize home missions in our Bible-schools."

They tell us that twenty-five per cent of all the foreigners landing at Ellis Island stop in Pennsylvania. We could put the people of six western states in Allegheny county alone and not have a population equal to that which is now here. In our twenty-six counties we have a population equal to that of twelve states of the Union. We have sixteen cities with more than five thousand population and some of them with fifteen thousand poulation that we have never entered at all. We have about one hundred and twenty-five cities and towns with more than one thousand population where the Gospel has never been preached by our people publicly.

E. A. HIBLER.
Pittsburg, Pa.

Following is a brief report for the past month: Closed a 16 days' meeting at Avoca, Ark., Oct. 2, with 21 additions, 14 baptized. This was a strategic point as a new house is nearing completion and we got in on the ground floor, while others were waiting for an opportunity. Things will go our way there.

Closed a 16 days' meeting at Pea Ridge, Oct. 18, with four additions, three from other churches and one baptism. This village of about 50 inhabitants is terrorized by sectarianism. Four meeting houses in the village. However, we preached to more people at that point than elsewhere in Arkansas.

Fayetteville, Ark. J. B. Lockhart.

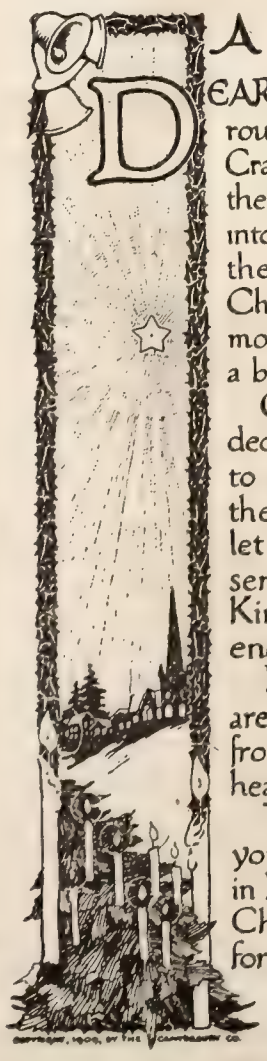
We have organized an afternoon Bible school. The attendance has increased almost 35 per cent. Our church attendance and local offerings increase slowly.

We feel encouraged and there is an air of encouragement among the membership. We are doing no great things but everlastingly keep adding small things together. The missionary spirit is growing.

Baltimore, Md. Clarence H. Poage.

The Sunday-School Tour

The Big Four Team, Thornton, Shepherd, Hopkins and Hackleman are holding a great series of Bible-school Parliaments. Splendid audiences and enthusiastic interest attend all the sessions. At Lexington, Ky., there were over one hundred out of town workers present representing fourteen counties. Cincinnati, Ohio, Indianapolis, Ind., and Bloomington, Ill., have all been tremendously successful.



The Front Rank Standard is being unanimously received and the schools are definitely committing themselves to it. Shepherd and Thornton keep every session full of the electrical current and Hackleman makes the music sound like a National Convention. The state men are rendering hearty co-operation.

It is good to see the schools promising to take the offering for American missions. Scores are being lined up that never did take in all the year set apart for this is November 20, Bible-school day for American missions. the offering before. Remember the one day

A CHRISTMAS GREETING

DEAR FRIENDS: Once more the whole round world gathers about the Manger-Cradle in Bethlehem. How wonderful that the Saviour of the world came as a Child into a human home. How full of wonder the words: "Unto us a Child is born!" Childhood is forever more significant, motherhood more sacred, the Home itself a brighter center of Life and Love.

"But the doctor?" suggested Rainier. "You surely don't include him in the round-up!"

The doctor, be it said, was an Acting Assistant Surgeon on his way back to the Islands for a tour of duty. Rainier had caught glimpses of him from time to time on the bridge during the voyage across. A compellingly handsome fellow with sharp and restless eyes, regular features and a jaw of adamant partly disguised by a 'van dyke.'

Rainier's question drew a characteristic grunt from the packer.

"Wait'll you see him. Doc kin drink my outfit under the table easy. I knew him up in Dawson three years ago. He wasn't in the Army then, but say, he was as thirsty as a voluteer regiment from a prohibition state. Ugly too, when he felt like it."

In ten minutes more the two were in rickshaws and threading the now dark streets toward a bad portion of the port, the unspeakable depravities of the red light district.

At length they came upon the plague spot, crowded even past midnight with the scum of the planet, its paper lanterns illuminating the evasive faces of row upon row of professional beauties stolidly gazing from their balconies at the eddying current below.

Alaska with unswerving instinct halted the two rickshaws before a gaudily illuminated front across which a sign staggered with the compelling assertion:

"Uncle Sam Boys Welcome Here."

No doubt the sign was of the truth for the two rescuers alighted to the music of a happy chorus that rattled out of the place through the paper glazing of the flimsy front.

"O we've busted bronks in th' Panhandel
In Montana we bust more.
We've busted eggs on Greaser's heads,
And we'll bust this on yore floor!"

The storm of jingling glass that marked the close of this effort witnessed to the utter sincerity of the singers and it was just as the glasses had crashed in effective unison to the floor of the brothel that Alaska stalked nonchalantly into the place closely followed by Rainier.

In the middle of a low room fitted in European style with chairs and tables stood Kistler and a soldier, shoeless and coatless. Both were gurgling happily as they drunkenly considered the scattered fragments on the floor at their feet. Two Japanese bartenders were also in the room, one setting out another round of drinks on a table at the end and one stolidly beginning to clear up the shattered glasses. A second soldier was seated in a chair, his legs thrust out stiffly before him, his campaign hat with it's dirty white cord dragged down over his eyes and his arms hanging helplessly at his sides. "Squeeze" showed dimly in a corner grinning cheerfully through a blue haze of tobacco smoke at Kistler and the "rooky." The physician's face riveted the attention of the correspondent. Men are mask wearers for the most part, but now and then the mask slips and the soul shows itself in the face. In the hell-light of the officer's eyes Rainier read a revelation that made him start.

Alaska had caught the attention of "Squeeze," motioned him to his side, and then raised his voice.

"Time's up, men. Git yer duds an' pike outen this."

The high harsh voice with its vibration of confidence and command brought every eye towards him and the summons was about to be obeyed. Kistler and his drinking companion both looked sheepishly for their coats. "Squeeze" came down the room obediently enough and began to rouse the stupefied soldier. Alaska sent out one of the Japanese to summon extra rickshaws and Rainier was admiring the hold that the chief packer had on the situation.

But resistance came from the corner. The expression in the doctor's face had suddenly changed to one of livid rage.

"Get out yourself, you—you horse-thief!" he roared, rising behind the table.

It was the final epithet on the frontier.

"Squeeze" flashed at the words from the drunken soldier to the side of Alaska and closed his fingers on the packer's right wrist.

His face was the face of fear.

But Alaska made no motion to avenge the insult. Without moving his body he twisted his arm free and held his eyes on the physician, his gaunt features impassive as the Sphinx for a moment and then relaxing into a grim smile. Every sober man in the room felt his pulse quicken and his breath come hard. There was an instant of chill silence. Then—

"You cheap leetle quack." The words came with a drawl of contempt. "I knowed you was the hull trouble. Papa will hev to spank."

The doctor's response was instant. Screaming a curse, he pushed the table aside with his left hand and fumbled at his breast with his shaking right. Rainier was the first to read the death-threat of the last movement and literally fell upon the man, crushing him back over his chair. There was a quick whirlpool of arms and legs and a rush of the spectators to interfere. But the saki soaked debauchee was no match for his little, clean-living assailant and in in less than a half minute he crumpled upon the grass matting, his eyes starting from their sockets. Rainier's hand was on his throat. As he fell, a glistening blue Smith & Wesson dropped from his grip and slid across the room.

The triumph had come so quckly that even Alaska had not found an opportunity to lend a hand in the fight. But he was now bending over ready with his cord and with the aid of the fairly sobered Kistler the doctor was trussed up and carried out to the street, storming and wriggling to the grim satisfaction of the packer.

Five jinrickshaws were lined up outside.

"Tie him in an' put a gag in his mouth," directed Alaska briefly. "He sings too much."

The order was gingerly executed by Rainier, Kistler and a soldier, the first having the privilege of jamming a by-no-means-new bandana into the handsome blasphemer's face.

"Now ef anyone else wants speshul attention?" suggested Alaska, eyeing his respectful assortment. But no one seemed eager. With obsequious alacrity soldiers and packers stumbled into their rigs and, though in one or two cases, swaying dangerously, were padded safely out into the night and finally huddled into a sampan at the Bund. As the last man wobbled along to his seat and the sampan scullers swung away from the Bund a vibrating roar broke from out the shipping in the moonlit harbor. It was the last warning whistle of the old "Hyson."

The quartermaster captain was hanging anxiously over the rail as Alaska sent his band up the ladder one by one. The doctor was the last in the boat save Rainier.

"Cut him loose," ordered Alaska, "An' pull his cork."

Rainier obeyed and started to steady the man as he reached for the ladder. The action brought them face to face.

"Wait 'til I get this drink out of me, you skunk, and I'll show you the time of your life," said the older man hoarsely.

"When you get the drink out of you, you'll know your friends when you see them," returned Rainier coldly.

The two went up to the deck, the doctor disappearing into the cabin.

Alaska had waited below to pay off the boatmen, but with the "Hyson" already moving out toward the Narrows he came up over the side and joined Rainier as he prepared to descend into the packers' quarters.

HUMAN ELECTRICITY

IN THE CURE OF AGE CONDITIONS.

The Science of Human Electricity proves that age weakness is actually a curable disease. A severe test has recently been made by taking 75 people, whose ages range from 65 to 97, most all of whom were suffering from some complication of chronic weakness. They were taught, through the new Science of Human Electricity how to increase the electrical power of their own organism; and the almost astounding results were that all except four reported decided increase of physical and mental power, and a great number have positively cured very serious conditions.

Through these, and many other tests, it has been absolutely demonstrated that the 10 to 30 years after a man passes 60, which are usually spent in age decline, can be made vital with the physical and mental power sufficient to enable one to accomplish the best work of his life.

Those interested can write for the booklet, "Organic Electricity," which explains why the age conditions are curable as well as the other forms of disease; and the Society would be glad to send any number of letters from those who have proved that these wonderful things can be accomplished, and that an understanding of the electric forces of life will bring a new era in the healing art.

THE LIFE OF JESUS IN FIFTY TWO LESSONS

By Dr. Loa Ermina Scott

A NEW TEXT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT CLASSES AND FOR HOME STUDY.—NOW IN PRESS

It comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus ever published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Christian Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for four years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

THE LIFE OF JESUS will fit in admirably with the BETHANY GRADED LESSONS, supplying the senior and advanced grades until the International Committee has prepared the courses for these higher grades.

The Deeper Thankfulness

"I HAVE LEARNED IN WHATSOEVER STATE I AM THEREWITH TO BE CONTENT. I KNOW BOTH HOW TO BE ABASED AND I KNOW HOW TO ABOUND."

This was the triumphant testimony of Paul after he had lived a long time in the companionship of Christ and had passed through many disciplines.

He had so far apprehended Christ that he had learned the secret of his Master's inward strength. He found contentment in the things of the spirit not in the shifting circumstances of his life.

If his circumstances were benign and comfortable he was content to accept them. Paul was no ascetic. He neither practiced nor counseled the abjuration of the goods of this life. He accepted the comforts that he found or as they were offered him and was grateful for them. But his gratitude was not dependent upon comforts.

He found cause for rejoicing, for thanksgiving, for contentment, in the midst of hostile circumstances. He had learned to suffer need and still be thankful. There had been built up within his soul a strong, clear sense of spiritual riches which the world's vicissitudes could not change or take away.

This triumph of the inner over the outer is the goal of all religious endeavor. To feel that the control of life's goods is within oneself, not in the incalculable, if not capricious, events which chance to come to one—this is the essence of religion. And the particular tone and character of this feeling is what marks off our Christianity from all other religions.

The stoic steels his heart against both good and evil. The ascetic, whether Catholic or Hindu, despises the world and runs away from it into the wilderness to cultivate an abstract piety, which always becomes morbid. The Christian Scientist denies the reality of the outer in order to establish the inner control. In its temper (though not in its ideas) Christian Science follows Socrates more than Jesus.

But with Paul, as with Christ, there was very close and wholesome relation between circumstances and soul. There was in the case of neither the Master nor his great missionary any need of a strained metaphysical theory to explain away common sense. Paul was not a stoic nor an ascetic nor a Christian Scientist. He was a Christian.

His nature had grown more sensitive, more tender, through the years in which he had been learning this secret of contentment. He was not detached from circumstances but increasingly related to them. He did not live above them, nor run away from them, nor deny their existence.

He found his life in them.

What made Paul great, as it had made his Master great before him, was the clear perception and the stern grasping of the principle that all circumstances, no matter what mask they wear, benign or hostile, have a contribution to make to the building up of the man himself.

This, of course, is the very genius of Jesus, if we may so speak of our Savior. He kept his hand off his circumstances. He took what came. We do not find him pulling wires to make his circumstances according to any plan of his own. There was in his soul a calm acceptance of the universe.

The apparent passivity of Jesus in the development of those events which carried him inexorably toward a violent end is one of the marvels of his career. Who of us, reading his biography, has not had moods of exasperation with the Master because of his refusal to employ strategy in his own behalf?

But the explanation of Jesus' attitude is that he conceived his circumstances as God-given. In the dim background of his life his faith discerned One who in infinite kindness had set him in the midst of just those circumstances which would be conducive to the growing of a holy soul. He accepted these circumstances. In the morning of his life he said to his Father, "I am come to do Thy will, O God."

And later, one in describing the character of Jesus said, "He was made perfect through the things he suffered."

Now Paul had learned this same secret. He learned that the important thing about life was not what particular circumstances one has, but what one does with them.

The big and significant product of life in this world is not what one does in the world out there, but what one becomes by doing it.

This world is made for character. Its existence can be justified only by the argument that every man in it has a chance to become a soul of infinite worth in the moral order. Certainly the world is not made for comfort, nor for material ambition, nor for temporal success of any kind.

The one open door to every soul, howsoever circumstanced, is the door of goodness, of courage, of sympathy. Howsoever a man may fail to make money or to gain health or to win his ambition, no man need fail of character.

This is what Paul had learned. It was because he had learned this truth that he could be content in any circumstances. He knew how to abound and how to suffer need because he discerned that both abundance and need were conditions of character.

He saw that if the supreme good of life was to be gained by him —a personal character fit for fellowship with God—he must go to school to adversity and learn her lesson and to prosperity and learn her lesson. And with this insight he was content to leave with God the proportioning of adversity and prosperity, rather than to demand it in some ratio of his own devising.

Only as we understand Paul's experience in some such way as this can we explain that saying of his, so hard for our hearts to believe, and yet so comforting even to our half-faith, "All things work together for good, to those who love God."

This, then, should suggest the true mood in which to celebrate Thanksgiving day. Our habit is to count our blessings on this day, to name over those good things which we have or have received through the year. This is a wholesome and fruitful exercise. We will be surprised at the abundance with which we have been blessed if we stop thoughtfully in the midst of our pursuits to reflect on it.

Gratitude for specific blessings is becoming to the noble soul. To live on, eating the bread of a kindly heaven and not thank the Giver of it for His fatherly care, betrays an ignoble nature.

But thankfulness that is nothing more than sentiment concerning the particular favors one happens to be receiving may be so superficial as to be really selfish. It may even give a certain warrant to the eighteenth century cynic who, in trying to prove the philosophy that selfishness is at the bottom of all seeming virtue, declared that "gratitude is but a lively sense of favors yet to come."

Paul's achievement in contentment stands ever as the shouting and indignant answer to such cynicism. Here is one man who, with his Master before him, is grateful not only for the good things of life, the comfortable things, the successful things, but for the adverse, the disappointing, things.

He is grateful for them because he has had just enough experience of meeting them in the power of Christ to discover that after he has met them he is himself more like Christ. He feels the girth of his soul enlarged and the treasures of the inner life more rich and precious.

The true thanksgiving observance is to inquire how one has fared in this matter of inner enrichment and control through the year Have I learned to find blessings in my reverses? Am I a bigger soul today than a year ago? Am I stronger against changes in my circumstances? Have I learned the passive art of accepting my outward lot in order that I may practice the active art of building up my soul?

Some such searching of our hearts, in a quiet hour apart from the festivities of this Thanksgiving day, will enable us to project the spirit of the day into all the days of the coming year.

For it will open up undreamed of fountains of peace and contentment and meaning which will fill all our days with gladness.

Hastening China's Parliament

News comes of the hastening of China's parliament and the celebrations of the students and educated classes over all the empire as a consequence. Ten thousand marched the streets of Pekin with great rejoicing and the night of the announcement the city was aglow with the celebrating lanterns.

The Prince Regent rebuffed the delegates from the provincial assemblies who came some months ago with a petition to set forward the date of the assembling of the proposed national legislature. They returned home with the avowed intention of preparing a petition of 25,000,000 names and declared they would send it to the Son of Heaven by a delegation of 2,500 leading m-n. Then the new imperial senate met in October and though one-half of the two hundred had been personally appointed by the Regent they passed a like petition by an almost unanimous vote. Report had it that they were reprimanded for their pains but the sequel shows that the Grand Council was impressed, for the Prince Regent has promulgated a decree forwarding the date for the assembling of the national parliament by two years. The original date was for 1915. The provincial assembly leaders declare they are not satisfied but will demand at least another year's elimination. They originally petitioned for an immediate election.

If the power of a moving body is measured by the mass multiplied by the velocity, then the Celestial Empire is in the midst of the most momentous political event of the age. Here is one-fourth of the human race, after three thousand years of monarchical government, turning in a decade from the ancient to the modern form and adopting a constitutional regime by a process of evolution that prophesies for the undertaking.

Revolution by Arrangement

Old students of Chinese affairs say the Boxer uprising was in reality a revolution meant to be directed against the Manchu dynasty but was turned by the craft of the shrewd old Empress Dowager into an anti-foreign war. The quick and stinging defeat which she suffered turned the same political craft to a recognition of the inevitable and with shrewd opportunism she concluded to ride the crest of the tide. She adopted the method Japan had used, under the advisement of Guido Verbeck, the grand old Dutch missionary statesman, and sent a commission around the world to study the governmental forms of the great nations. In 1905 the old system of examinations was abolished and western practical learning substituted for the ancient tests of memorizing and literary composing—in other words efficiency was substituted for literary chauvinism as a test for official position. A system of schools was designed for the nation that will in time reach every village in the empire and build like a pyramid up to a great Imperial University. Then under the conservative direction of great men the nation was directed to the task of preparing for self-government.

First each of the twenty-two provinces or states in the empire was given the privilege of electing a Provincial Assembly. The right of suffrage was limited as hereinafter noted and the local legisatures were to be convened as deliberative bodies with power for the present to do no more than recommend to the throne such things as they thought to be for the immediate welfare of their state or province. Next an Imperial Senate was convened in Pekin. It consisted of two hundred members, one-half of whom had been appointed by the Prince Regent and the other half of whom, though chosen by the provincial assemblies, had to be approved by the ruling Viceroy of the province. Both the provincial and national assemblies proved radical in their demands.

Who Votes in China

The conservatism with which the revolution is approached is noted in the grant of franchise. Twenty-five years is made the "majority" for a young man instead of our twenty-one and a man must be thirty to hold an office. All illiterates, opium smokers and lawbreakers are excluded regardless of other qualifications. Then to vote one must have graduated from some school of recognized standing either at home or abroad, be a member of the literati, i. e., those who had passed successful examinations under the old examinations, who have been three years in educational work or done other public service, have reached as high as the seventh grade in the civil service, or the fifth in the miltary service, or have property worth at least $5,000. If he possesses $10,000 worth of property he can vote in any province where it is located. It will thus be seen that China is adopting the old-world system of franchise rather than the American.

Heretofore Christians have been practically debarred from holding offices under civil service because of the obligation laid upon all public servants to make obeisance to the tablets of Confucius. But they are not debarred from voting and many were elected to the assemblies. It is not to be doubted that the superior training of those who have received their training in the mission schools over all but those who have studied abroad will give them in China, as in Japan, an influence out of all proportion to their numbers. If there were space to reiterate something of the influence the missionaries have had in bringing about the renaissance of China it would form the most gratifying part of this story of the Celestial Empire's political evolution. The work has been quiet and, like that of the architect, confined to the plans that lay behind the building of the structure but the major part of the inspiration that has been the propulsive power in thrusting forth the new nation has been generated in the mission schools.

The Blossoming of Political Wisdom

When the decree of 1907 had called for provincial assemblies and described the conditions of franchise the central government sent lecturers into every district in the empire to give lectures and answer personal questions about the right and privileges of franchise and to make plain to the new-made voters and political aspirants just what the prerogatives of the new legislatures were to be and how their organization could be effected. The younger men flocked to these lectures and showed great enthusiasm. The provincial elections passed of with quiet and order. The older literati and mandarins could not comprehend the movement and were steadfast in their opposition. Those provinces having most access to foreign men and things cast the larger number of ballots but the limitations of the franchise prevents any great number taking part in the elections. This is doubtless the only feasible plan in such a nation as China. To limit the franchise by educational qualifications is certainly wisdom in even the most democratic of lands. In Shangtung, with a poulation of 36,000,000, there were but 120,000 voters; in Chi-li, with 18,000,000 population, there was a much larger number. These two provinces illustrate the difference between the interior and less leavened communities and the coastal and more touched of world influences. In no case could more than 1 per cent of the population qualify under the educational and property qualifications.

When the assemblies met they discussed how to abolish footbinding and superstition and methods of building up trade. They generally advocated the repeal of interstate tariff customs, the adoption of more modern ways of transferring property and of means to expedite and broaden the coming representative government. But they could not content themselves with the consideration of local matters and launched out beyond the terms of their charters, discussing currency reform for the empire, the opium problem and that of railway extension, dredging of rivers, judicial reform and taxation came in for consideration. In all these things they showed great wisdom, patience and patriotism.

New Nationalism in China

China has a real new nationalism. Heretofore her weakness has been in her decentralization. Each province has been largely independent. It has been able to absorb from two-thirds to three-fourths of the taxes and if a man of boldness and ability became Viceroy he could rule like an independent king. There has been a system of state customs or "liken" that prevented amalgamation of interests; as in the United States the new constitution will doubtless make them impossible. The country has many different dialects and no common language for any but the educated. It has as many systems of weights and measures as provinces almost and the currency is not uniform. It has been a wonderfully cohesive race rather than a closely-co-ordinated nation. All this the new parliament is promising to speedily correct. The educated young men of China are inspired with a new patriotism. They could not be restrained in the provincial assemblies and persisted in discussing national problems. But there were no outbreaks and all clashes were settled wth statesmanlike poise. In many of the assemblies the government was frankly criticized and in Canton there were some clashes with local governing authorities over prerogatives, but no breaks.

When the Imperial Senate met it was commissioned only to deliberate and give council to the throne. The cynical and world-hardened said it would only advise as the throne desired. But it was far from truculent. The provincial assemblies had elected one-half the senators and they led in petitioning for an immediate power to legislate. Those appointed by the Emperor joined in the demand until the majority was overwhelming. The Grand Council and Emperor refused the petition but after adjournment issued the decree shortening the time for the calling of the new parliament by two years and setting the date for three years hence.

China's New-Born Freedom

"Freedom of religion" is a new-born phrase in Chinese language. It is a phrase that has marked a new era for every nation when it learned to use it. Another word that is greatly used now is one that means "an ideal," literally in the Chinese it is "the thing you have your eye on." Other words now being conjured with and passing as most current in the new vocabulary are reform, service, society, public good, constitutional, initiative and educate. A new dictionary is being made by the new words that are being coined to meet the new occasions and vast additions are being made in scientific nomenclature. The newspaper is becoming omnipresent over the empire and is today as free as our own in the chief cities. The most burning questions are freely discussed in a manner that would have cost the writers' execution with the most horrible torture in the days of the old Dowager. They denounce the mandarins with a word that corresponds to our elegant modern term "rotten." Thus the new-born freedom of the hoary old empire is taking hold of the masses. But the Chinaman is never very excitable except it be some matter that might give a street rabble a holiday. He is conservative in temper and stands a good chance of evolving his new government peaceably. Of course there are irreconcilables and haters of the foreigner and a mass ignorance which might be aroused by an appeal to superstition, but most of the people have so long honored learning that it is safe to predict that the new era of government by the educated of each community will be welcomed as a vast improvement over the old mandarin rule.

The government has issued an order looking toward the abolition of slavery. It is characteristically conservative and does not absolutely abolish it but prohibits the sale and purchase of human beings excepting only these held in the households of the Manchu princes. Sale of concubines and children is prohibited, but children may be bound out for a term of twenty-five years. A petition asking that Chinamen in foreign lands be allowed to cut off the queue was granted, but the petitioners were reminded that China's future did not depend upon such surface questions as queue or no queue.

The Vaster Revolution

The vaster revolution in China is that of her industrial and social life. The first railroad was received there much as it was in England. Today there are more than 6,000 miles of steel rails and as much more surveyed. Best of all, the government has rid the country of the foreign exploiter and will build her own highways of commerce as Japan has done. There are 40,000 miles of telegraph wire and many of the most remote mission stations may now talk to the civilized world. In twelve years the national postal system has made stupendous growth and is now handling well up toward a half-million pieces annually. The old private companies protested just as the express and freight companies do here that they did it better than government ever could. Mail is sent over 80,000 miles of post roads with an expedition and economy that makes the old system look very ancient and barbaric.

But there will be some convulsion in the industrial, if not in the political evolution. Already some of the newspapers are being subsidized by the wealthy and official classes and great syndicates are asking for monopoly rights. It is inconceivable that the Grand Council should be so modern as not to sacrifice much future common welfare to the aristocratic and wealthy privileged classes of today. Neither is it conceivable that the new parliament and provincial assemblies, when they are endowed with legislative powers, should be so wise as not to fall into the currents of the time in more mature governments and sacrifice the future common good to the desire for haste in present development. The old politically privileged classes will be changed to some degree into a new financially privileged class as in England and Germany even if democracy in government does not lead to laissez faire in commerce and industry, as it has in the United States. Then the hasty coming of new inventions will throw multitudes temporarily out of employment and trouble will be the result. Truly there is no birth without the travail of pain.

A Prize for Prohibition Argument

The Anti-Saloon League of Maryland has flung out a prize offer which ought to result in a fine line of new arguments for prohibition. They propose to give $1,000 in prizes for the best essays showing how much it costs Baltimore (1) morally, (2) physically, (3) mentally, (4) financially, and (5) industrially, to secure the million dollars annually received under the high license law. The prize for the best essay is $500, with three additional prizes of $250, $150 and $100, respectively, for the three next best. The contest is open to any person anywhere except salaried employes of the Anti-Saloon League of Maryland. Essays must not exceed 5,000 words. Each number expressed in figures will count as one word. The number of words must be indicated, and, other things being equal, brevity will be considered in making the award. Facts will count for more than mere argument. Essays must be typewritten, double spaced, with ample margin, on one side of plain white paper, 8 1-2 x 11 inches, with name and address of the writer securely attached in a sealed envelope. Essays must be received, postage fully prepaid, by Rev. J. F. Heisse, D. D., Chairman of the Headquarters Committee, at the League office, 801 American Building, Baltimore, Md., on or before April 1, 1911. The decision will be made by the Headquarters Committee of the Anti-Saloon League, or by judges designated by them, and will be announced and the prizes paid as soon as the essays can be examined and a decision reached.

Declines Ministerial Concession

Editors The Christian Century: I have been preaching for seventeen years. My salary has never been large, but I have always felt like paying my way without favoritism from railroads, merchants, etc., on account of my profession. Furthermore, I am particularly desirous of supporting as liberally as I can that which is for the interest of the kingdom.

I have received The Christian Century at the ministerial rate of $1.00. Until recently my conscience did not condemn me for it. I have now repented and want to pay for it at the regular rate of $1.50 in advance. I know you are losing money when furnishing the paper at the reduced rate. It is full of good things. It cheers my heart. It feeds my life. I get sermons from it, which if they were obtained from books in the course of a year would cost me many dollars. I believe many ministers who believe as I do would be glad to join in eliminating your special clerical rate.—A. S. J.

The liberal and gracious spirit of our correspondent is greatly appreciated in the office of The Christian Century, both by business manager and editors. The question of reduction to ministers is one that is often discussed in the office, but always settled by falling back to the present basis. The practice of ministerial reductions is not general among religious papers, there being few if any high class journals besides the Disciple publications which grant it. The business office of this paper is perfectly willing, in view of the long-established custom, to make the concession, but asks that it be made plain that the one dollar rate to ministers holds only when payment is made in advance. Other subscribers receive their paper for $1.50 when paid in advance. But all share alike in the two dollar rate—ministers and laymen—when the payment is delayed more than thirty days.

Shall Preachers Be Modest?

To an editor compelled by the custom of his craft to hide his personality behind an opaque "we," there is a psychological puzzle in the free way in which singers, actors, elocutionists, evangelists, and lyceum lecturers bring their personalities to the front to praise and advertise themselves, their achievements and their talents. It is all done in such a naive and unconscious manner as to suggest a sort of dual personality. The subject has come to divide himself into two selves—the ego and the artistic or performing self. This latter self is objectified by the "ego" as a real "other." Its virtues can therefore be praised without scruple or embarrassment.

The case of a preacher, a common-place man (to be very generous to him), who got up a lecture bill entitled "The Greatest Orators of America," grouping Beecher, Phillips, Clay, Brooks, Gunsaulus, and such men in a great circle with his own picture in the center, is a good illustration.

At a group conference in Topeka an evangelist spoke three minutes. When he sat down a mild-mannered and kindly pastor who was sitting beside us, whom we would not have suspected of such deliberate detective designs, handed us the back of an envelope on which he had registered fifty-seven times that the evangelist had used the pronoun "I!" And we were not there to discuss him at all!

It would be a satisfaction if some reader could explain the state of mind of a pastor who wrote the editors recently the following note. We print it in full, every word, excepting, of course the signature:

Dear Brethren:—Please make a good announcement of the fact that I will enter evangelistic work beginning Jan. 1. I will give you some facts about myself and work, then you may use them in an impersonal way. My success in meetings has been so marked that friends urge me take this step. Am a splendid leader of song, a fine solist, and can easily take the place of singing evangelist besides the preaching. People who hear me say I am a convincing and persuasive speaker. At least I always get results. My reputation is that of being unique without being freakish. Have fine appearance in pulpit and succeed in fixing the attention of the audience in what is going on in the pulpit. This may sound egotistical, but all of this has been said to me by many. Terms reasonable. Will go anywhere called. Out strictly for the Master's business in a master's way.

This man must be a wonder. The boys in the street would call him a "dream." If any church wishes to correspond with him we will gladly furnish his name, but the request must be signed by the complete official board as a sign of good faith before we will divulge his identity.

Trying to Make Bad History Comfortable

Bishop Morrison, of Iowa, delivered the triennial sermon before the Episcopal General Convention in Cincinnati last month. It was conceived as a memorial to the first missionary bishop of the Episcopal church in the United States, the Rev. Jackson Kemper, who was consecrated seventy-five years ago. Bishop Kemper's diocese was Indiana and Missouri. Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Nebraska were also the scene of his labors. He wrote pleadingly to the church to send laborers and money into the new territory and complained that the Episcopalian policy lacked aggressiveness. "Why should we limit our efforts in this new country to our own household? Who besides ourselves have done it? Do the Methodists, for example, seek only their own? I have found their preachers every where in the remotest, the most obscure, corners in the confines of our country, among aborigines. They go to seek those who are lost, to preach the gospel to the poor, the ignorant and the debased, and they are constantly gathering congregations from every class of society." "So Methodism flourished," adds Bishop Morrison, after quoting Bishop Kemper's words. "It became the church of the farmers and of the small town. The Baptists did much the same sort of work. Afterwards the Christian, nicknamed the Campbellite, church followed the same policy." The effect of this missionary initiative, admits Bishop Morrison, was to produce a civilization "not one whit behind the American people in any part of the country." What these other churches gained the Episcopal church lost and has never recovered, namely the allegiance of vast masses of the American people, especially in rural districts. From this history Bishop Morrison strives pathetically to extract a grain of comfort. "We simply could not do what these churches did, and grievous for the Christianity of America would it have been if we had attempted to do so." The remainder of the Bishop's sermon is devoted to a justification of his church for refusing to utilize the popular and non-sacramental methods in the strength of which these other churches prospered.

Other voices of the Episcopal convention struck a different note than that sounded in the "keynote" sermon. Bishop Brent called attention to the "pale respectability which so characterizes our church," and urged his brethren to lay it aside and "run the perils that will make our church more virile." Speaking of Christian unity, he says: "Rather than continue in the lines of conventional Christianity, I would run the risk of losing our distinctive character in trying to gain the unity whch Jesus Chrst meant his church to have."

The Churchman (New York) commenting on Bishop Morrison's sermon, says: "Our Lord and his apostles plainly did not feel that there was any compromise of loyalty to him and his Body in meeting the conditions of humanity. Of course we cannot say that ordination is nothing, but has not Bishop Morrison shown that ordination is nothing to the vast mass of Americans, and that in our hands priesthood means nothing to them? This is our undoing so far as they are concerned. It is not their fault, nor is it the fault of the sacramental character of the church. The fault is ours and it is for us to repent and to demonstrate to all classes the power of the divine order."

Clearly there is an awakening sense among Episcopalians that they too, despite their historic dignity and their sacramentarian claims, must finally submit to the Master's test. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Christ's church is not identified by its form of organization, its historic continuity or any such thing. The church that does Christ's work is His church, the only true and catholic church that ever was or ever shall be.

"The Blessings Which Hallow Our Days."

A short time before her death, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe said to her minister, "The longer I drain the cup of life the sweeter it grows. All the sugar is at the bottom." Not all old people speak in this manner. Some emphasize "the worm, the canker, and the grief." How shall we account for the conflicting reports sent back by those who have traveled far on the way of life? The embittered ones lay the blame on circumstances. To one who considers all the facts the fault seems to be more with persons than with things. The cheerful old people are not all favorites of fortune and many of the disappointed ones have had the best the world has to offer.

The annual festival of thanksgiving affords an opportunity to observe the attitudes of men toward life. If praise is offered to God for all his benefits, what are the particular benefits singled out as signally manifesting the divine favor? If fault is found with the management of the universe, who is it that finds fault and what is the particular part of the machinery that is out of order? There are those who thank God that they are better than other men, that they have been able to get possession of the earnings of others, and that their opinions are popular. Others have the feeling of gratitude aroused when they remember that they have stood for the unpopular cause for the reason that it is the cause of justice and truth. They rejoice that they have helped to remove temptation from the path of the weak and have given aid to the over-burdened. The unthankful are apt to have private grievances which they nurse tenderly. Their get-rich-quick scheme turned out badly and now they have to live upon the fruits of their own labor instead of having others toil for them.

In the providence of God we have acquired the means of fighting disease with intelligence. Our ancestors had a dread of disease which is to us unknown. The mystery of it was terrifying to them. Their remedies were often more dangerous than their ills. In withholding water from the fever patient they thought they were aiding in his recovery. The races untouched by modern thought about the body are still using drums to drive away the demons of sickness. With our present knowledge we may hope to banish from the earth some of the most dreadful scourges that have terrified and tormented men. Every one of us ought to be thankful for the privilege of engaging in the warfare against disease. We do not need to be physicians in order to be of use in reducing the death rate from tuberculosis, typhoid fever, pneumonia, and scarlet fever. Our new knowledge has made us aware of many bad habits which must be discarded if the world is to be free from preventable diseases.

The opportunity is open to us to teach the world the highest truth we have learned. This is cause for thanksgiving. We do not have to spend our days in unseemly squabbles over the opinions of our good forefathers. They have done their work so well that we have on hand more work than we can do. The Young Men's Christian Association is entering the educational and economic centers of the world with its gospel of bodily, mental, and spiritual health. The parents of today have great reason to thank God for the opportunity their sons have to count for something in the spiritual history of the world. The missionary societies are calling for the strongest men and women of the churches for tasks which only the strongest can perform. The public schools need thoroughly trained teachers who know the relation of the schools to social, economic, and religious conditions. The ministry gives opportunity for the exercise of the highest gifts of mind and heart. Religious forces must be recognized. There are too many divisions among Christians. In this time of transition it is supremely important that the right sort of men have the place of leadership. It is no wonder that young men of promise are turned away from the ministry when they observe the rivalry of the churches and are made to feel that a good part of a minister's business is to denounce his fellow Christians who do not agree with him on certain points of teaching. We can say to young men that the minister has bigger business than sectarian controversy and that the churches are becoming more and more concerned that he shall attend to his real business. For this we can sing with spirit the Te Deum.

Religious Philosophy of William James

An Interpretation of the Famous Pragmatist and His School

BY PROFESSOR EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES.

It is always interesting to have an eminent man express his views of religion. When Mr. Rockefeller addresses a Sunday-school class, or President Taft talks about the churches, or a United States congressman occupies a pulpit, then the newspaper reporters have something to make copy, for the people are sure to be interested. But if the great man is also a scientist and a philosopher then his word concerning religion is listened to, not only with curiosity, but with respect and serious eagerness. Professor William James became known to the public first as a psychologist and as a Harvard professor. His text-book in psychology became the revelation of the mental world to more than one generation of college students throughout America. Here they found a juicy book on a traditionally dry subject. It was illuminating, fascinating, and human as perhaps no other text-book of its time, was. It remains a unique classic among scientific works.

No Theological Bias.

Now when this brilliant Harvard professor of psychology began to write about religion, it was a matter of course that he would have a great company of readers. It was evident that he was not circumscribed by any theological presuppositions. He had come to psychology by way of medicine, and in psychology he was an insurgent, so to speak. He began with physiology. He announced that his "working hypothesis" was that all mental states are correlated with brain-states, and said he would employ the hypothesis in the most radical way. He eliminated the ancient doctrine of the soul as a thing or substance, which is the inner essence of man, and proceeded frankly to talk of psychology without a soul. All of this was immensely pleasing to the materialistic and naturalistic temper of the age. Besides, Professor James had a marvelous way of saying everything, which made him fascinating to people far removed from his academic sphere of learning. This fascination was due to his capacity for facts and to his charming literary style, which has been unrivaled in the literature of modern science. What I call his capacity for facts led him to load his pages with all sorts of vivid descriptions of everyday experiences and with the liveliest quotations from literature, especially from biography. His mind fled from the cold and formal abstractions of his colleagues in philosophy as a healthy boy flees from the quiet stuffiness of a ladies' parlor, where all the delicate, gilded furnishings caution him to be very sedate and proper.

Varieties of Religious Experience.

Every one who knew of Professor James at all, was certain to be interested in what he might say of religion. Certainly here was a writer without prejudices and without traditions or conventionalities who would get at the facts, report them with all their native color and warmth, and interpret them by the dispassionate methods of science. His volume on the "Variety of Religious Experience" was the first book on religion from the hand of an authority in the new psychology. Since that time, now nearly ten years ago, Professor James has published three other books in which he touched upon religious problems. From all of these sources, I have gathered the impressions which are put together here as suggestive of his religious philosophy. Much of it is in his own words, after the manner so characteristic of himself, for it was always a favorite method with him to make copious quotations from the authors he cited.

I shall indicate briefly his treatment of three points; first, the differences in religious experience, due to temperament and training; second, the nature and function of religious doctrines especially the doctrine of God; and third, the practical significance and outcome of religious faith.

Inborn Differences Among Men.

The world has waited for the advent of the psychologist to make it clear that there are constitutional differences among men, which result in very different types of religious experiences. There are those who are constitutionally disposed to take life in an altogether optimistic manner. But it is more than animal happiness. "I mean those," too, says Professor James, "who when unhappiness is offered or proposed to them, positively refuse to feel it, as if it were something mean and wrong. We find such persons in every age, passionately flinging themselves upon their sense of the goodness of life, in spite of the hardships of their own condition, and in spite of the sinister theologies into which they may be born." These constitute the once-born type, like Walt Whitman, and Edward Everett Hale. With some, this attitude of happiness is seemingly an endowment, and with others a cultivated mood. "In fact, we all do cultivate it more or less," says James, "Even when our professed theology should in consistency forbid it. We divert our attention from disease and death as much as we can; and the slaughter-houses and indecencies without end on which our life is founded, are huddled out of sight and never mentioned, so that the world we recognize officially in literature and in society is a poetic fiction far handsomer and cleaner and better than the world that really is."

Religion of Healthy-mindedness.

This typical way of seeing the world has organized itself into religious movements, known as new-thought, mind-cures and the like, and they are patiently described and quoted as illustrating one type of religion, the religion of healthy-mindedness. Then we are shown the religion of the sick-soul. Here is agony, depression, pessimism and rebellion. Martin Luther, that mountainous, volcanic soul is called to witness, and Luther feels when he has grown old that his life has been a failure. The Electress Dowager, one day when Luther was dining with her, said to him: " 'Doctor, I wish you may live forty years to come.' 'Madam,' replied he, 'rather than live forty years more, I would give up my chance of Paradise.' "

Tolstoy at about the age of fifty, passed through this soul-sickness, which he describes in the fable of the traveler, surprised in the desert by a wild beast. "Seeking to save himself from the fierce animal, the traveler jumps into a well with no water in it: but at the bottom of this well he sees a dragon waiting with open mouth to devour him. And the unhappy man, not daring to go out lest he should be the prey of the beast, not daring to jump to the bottom lest he should be devoured by the dragon, clings to he branches of a wild bush which grows out of one of the cracks of the well. His hands weaken and he feels that he must soon give way to certain fate; but still he clings, and sees two mice, one white, the other black, evenly moving round the bush to which he hangs, and gnawing off its roots. Thus I hang upon the boughs of life—I can see but one thing: the inevitable dragon and the mice—I cannot turn my gaze away from them."

In such experiences, the vanity of life, the sense of sin and the fear of the universe, disrupt the happy calm of the optimist's world. To the sick-soul, the healthy-minded seem unspeakably blind and shallow, while to the healthy-minded, in James' phrase, "there is something almost obscene about these children af wrath and cravers of a second birth."

Sick Souls and Their Cure

He follows these sick souls through the pain of their convictions of sin, quoting from all sorts and conditions of men, and shows how at length by these fiery trials and sufferings, they emerge at last through conversion into the peace and light of the new-birth. He quotes their hallelujahs, and their glory-songs and fills his pages with their testimonies, yet admits that he himself never felt what they describe. He is just faithfully recording the different types of religious phenomena and insisting they are different and that it is absurd for any one type to insist that all persons shall experience conversion, or shall exhibit the optimism of the mind-curers before they may be called religious.

I should say that this appreciation of the variety of religious experience, and its full and dramatic rehearsal and interpretation constitutes the first great contribution of Professor James to the philosophy of religion.

The New Doctrine of Pragmatism.

The second thing I mention is his famous doctrine of pragmatism, in its bearing upon religious doctrines, particularly upon the doctrine of God. Pragmatism means practicability. It means serviceability, and utility. It is concerned vitally with the meaning of truth. We have been taught by the rationalists and the absolute idealists that truth, spelled with a capital T, represents a fixed and eternal order of things, of which, by rigid logic and by heroic mental discipline we may gain knowledge. But the pragmatists take truth in a more immediate and empirical way. Indeed they talk more about particular truths than about truth in general. They are interested in the truthfulness of particular ideas and definite systems of ideas. "Ideas become true" for them, "just in so far as they help us to get into satisfactory relation with other parts of our experience." Ideas are true as tested by the experience to which they refer. "Any idea upon which we can ride, so to speak; any idea that will carry us prosperously from any one part of our experience to any other part, linking things satisfactorily, working securely, simplifying, saving labor; is true for just so much."

"The Cash Value of Ideas."

Pragmatism seeks for the cash value of ideas in present experience. It holds that the value of ideas changes. The truth, which is important for one stage of experience, may be unimportant for another. In a sense we put away the truths of childhood, when we become men. For example, it was significant in our boyhood world to know the truth about how fast our fellows could run, because it helped us to deal with them, as in choosing sides for games. But most of us do not play those games any more and few of us know the truth about our own running speed or endurance, much less that of our fellows. In this way, ideas, according to Professor James, go into "cold storage." They were once fresh in the garden of action, but being no longer needed in our work or play, they depart from the warm spots of our feelings and interests and are buried in the grave of disuse.

What Doctrines Are Crucial?

Now all these characteristics of truths and of ideas are applicable to religious truths and beliefs. The question as to whether animal sacrifices were better than cereal offerings was once highly important. In New Testament times the question of circumcision involved the apostles themselves in serious misunderstandings. In later centuries, and to this day, for some minds, the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary is a crucial doctrine. At the present time, some doctrines once held for essentials, are slipping away into Limbo. Professor James shows that among these is one of the ideas which has been regarded for centuries as an indispensable truth of religion, namely, the doctrine of an Absolute, of a Perfect Being, an omniscient, omnipresent, and omnipotent God. "The truth of 'God' has to run the gauntlet of all our other truths. It is on trial by them and they on trial by it."

Professor James' own conclusion, wrought out through many long and technical discussions, is that our idea of God is like our other ideas. "On pragmatistic principles, he says, if the hypothesis of God works satisfactorily in the widest sense of the word, it is true. Now, whatever its residual difficulties may be, experience shows that it certainly does work, and that the problem is to build it out and determine it so that it will combine satisfactorily with all the other working truths."

Peoples' God Too Remote.

His objection to the common notion of God is that it is too remote, too abstract, too far beyond our world to afford the help we need. "It disdains empiricism's needs. It substitutes a pallid outline for the real world's richness. It is dapper, it is noble in the bad sense, in the sense in which to be noble is to be inept for humble service. In this real world of sweat and dirt, it seems to me that when a view of things is 'noble' that ought to count as a presumption against its truth, and as a philosophic disqualification. The prince of darkness may be a gentleman, as we are told he is, but whatever the God of earth and heaven is, he can surely be no gentleman. His menial services are needed in the dust of our human trials, even more than his dignity is needed in the sky above us."

Religion Reinforced by Pragmatism.

Professor James regarded himself as in possession of a philosophy which promised a new and unprecedented strength to religious [illegible] as the harbinger of a kind of prophet of the coming day when religion and modern science would pass beyond their misunderstandings and antipathies and unite together in a practical and mutual support of the great, ideal human interests. "Let empiricism once become associated with religion," he says, "as hitherto, through some strange misunderstanding, it has been associated with irreligion, and I believe that a new era of religion as well as of philosophy will be ready to begin. That great awakening of a new popular interest in philosophy, which is so striking a phenomenon at the present day in all countries, is undoubtedly due in part to religious demands. As the authority of past tradition tends more and more to crumble, men naturally turn a wistful ear to the authority of reason or to the evidence of present fact. They will assuredly not be disappointed if they open their minds to what the thicker and more radical empiricism has to say. I fully believe that such an empiricism is a more natural ally than dialectics ever were, or can be, of the religious life."

Practical Fruits of Religious Faith.

The third feature of this great philosopher's religious philosophy is his insistence upon the practical fruits of religious faith. His idea of God is that of a greater consciousness than our own with which we are in living relation. It is a favorite remark with him that we humans may be in the universe like the dogs and cats in our libraries—seeing and hearing many things, sharing in the warmth of it all, but having no inkling of what it is all about. It was partly upon this notion of a large, encircling consciousness that he founded an argument for immortality. It was this, too, which interested him for twenty-five years in the Society for Psychical Research, though he never felt that there was as yet any scientific evidence of communication with the dead.

On the side of practical, everyday virtues he found his religious faith of the utmost significance. This is vividly set forth in the closing pages of his essay on "Is Life Worth Living?" "This life is worth living, we can say, since it is what we make it, from the moral point of view." Omitting any further comments, let us hear the ringing words with which that essay closes:

Is Life Worth Living?

"God himself, in short, may draw vital strength and increase of very being from our fidelity. For my own part, I do not know what the sweat and blood and tragedy of this life mean, if they mean anything short of this. If this life be not a real fight, in which something is eternally gained for the universe by success, it is no better than a game of private theatricals from which one may withdraw at will. But it feels like a real fight,—as if there were something really wild in the universe which we, with all our idealities and faithfulnesses, are needed to redeem; and first of all to redeem our own hearts from atheisms and fears. For such a half-wild, half-saved universe our nature is adapted.

"These, then, are my last words to you: Be not afraid of life. Believe that life is worth living, and your belief will help create the fact. The "scientific proof" that you are right may not be clear before the day of judgment (or some stage of being which that expression may serve to symbolize) is reached. But the faithful fighters of this hour, or the beings that then and there will represent them, may then turn to the faint-hearted, who here decline to go on, with words like those with which Henry IV greeted the tardy Crillon after a great victory had been gained: "Hang yourself, brave Crillon! we fought at Arques, and you were not there."

Hymn of Fellow-help

By Arthur Hugh Clough.

When the enemy is near thee,
In our hands we will upbear thee;
He shall neither scathe nor scare thee,
He shall fly thee and shall fear thee.
Call on us!

Call when all good friends have left thee,
Of good sights and sounds bereft thee;
Call when hope and heart are sinking,
And the brain is sick with thinking:
Help, O help!

When the panic comes upon thee,
Hope and choice have all foregone thee,
Fate and force are closing o'er thee,
And but one way stands before thee
Call on us!

Oh, and if thou dost not call,
Be but faithful, that is all.
Go right on, and close behind thee
There shall follow still and find thee
Help, sure help.

John R. Mott's Call to Unity

In the different movements for unity in the mission fields we see the beginning of this great union which is yet to come. The student volunteer movement for foreign missions and the laymen's movement are phases of the same movement. If the workers in the field and at home could vote on this question tonight they would vote for the most complete union practicable. It is a movement which cannot be stopped. It is not to be supposed that it will come all at once. But it is sure to come. If Christian unity could be secured in the field it would double the efficiency of the missionary force. It is a stupendous undertaking to which we have set our hands. We cannot do the work if we labor on different lines. The opposition and the divisive tendencies are great. Success lies only in unity. We cannot meet difficulties like these and be divided. It was the great prayer of the Lord that we might be one, that the world might believe. Dis-union delays the conversion of the world to Christ.

We are challenged to Christian unity by the urgency of the situation. There is a rising tide of nationalism and patriotism. There is a recrudescence of hate and race feeling. This is discouraging, not only to the pessimist, but to the optimist, in the beginning of a century when we hoped that all would work together for peace. Nothing but the Christian religion can meet the emergency.

Again, we must prevent the duplication and overlaping of work. We must not spread our western differences over the eastern world. They are largely occidental, superficial and needless in many ways. We should not carry these divisions to the East. They are contrary to the revealed mind of Jesus Christ. Foreign nations will not see the true Christ as long as his followers are divided.

We are summoned to Christian unity by the promise of success. There are seventy or eighty armies marching upon a common object. But they have no common board of strategy. Nothing could withstand us if we had such a common board and a common army, working for a common goal.

The problem exists equally in the home field. It is a matter which concerns every one who has at heart the wishes of our Lord Jesus Christ. We realize our unity by realizing our oneness. We are one whether we think we are or not. We need penitence, contrition and confession of the awfulness of the sin of our divisions. We are to get our unity, not by compromise, but by comprehension. This does not mean uniformity, but unity characterized by diversity and liberty. Another process is that of transcendence—rising to the heights where we see things in their true light and setting. Then comes intercession—the one method which Christ so eloquently impressed upon his disciples. When we begin to pray for unity we will be smitten as hypocrites if we do not work for unity. Another process making for unity is fellowship. Conferences carefully planned and ably led are worth while. The plastic nations must be Christianized while they are plastic. Chains of Christian colleges must be established all over the non-Christian world. Great tasks will weld us together. Union in actual work makes further union easier. But unity is not an end in itself—only a means. More apostles of reconciliation must be raised up. No one body has a better title to that name than the American Board.—From an address before the Congregational Council in Boston.

Chicago Women's Inspiring Advance

Middle Stage of Jubilee Tour Reached in this City

BY MRS. MARIE V. BOWMAN.

This year has seen two great and significant movements in modern missions. The Layman's Missionary campaign has reached the inner consciousness of thousands of men, and fastened their attention to the responsibility of individuals toward the Christianizing of the world, and has resulted in recruiting the ranks of mission-speaking and mission-feeling people by thousands, and in directing an astonishingly great sum of money into the treasuries of the mission boards of all churches.

More recently this movement has been followed by a similar one among women—the motive of the hour being found in the celebration of a "Jubilee" commemorating fifty years of organized missionary work by women.

These Jubilee meetings were planned by a group of women from all churches, known as the Inter-denominational Committee, the same committee which plans study courses each year for missionary societies.

From California to New York.

These women arranged for a series of great mass meetings to be held in all of the large cities of the United States, beginning early in October in California and closing with a "Rally of rallies" to be held in New York in the early spring of 1911.

Different denominational Boards furnished speakers and leaders to make up a party which, in conjunction with local leaders in each city, are conducting a campaign throughout the country.

Two days are given, generally, in each city, to different kinds of meetings, some in churches, some in large halls, and others in prominent homes, while always the social fellowship feature has been fostered by the gathering together of the women at a luncheon or tea, at which acquaintances may be made, friendships formed, and the personal equation emphasized.

To the thoughtful observer of the signs of the times, to the one who, with cleared vision, can see the Unseen moving upon the face of the waters, these wonderful meetings which reached the central point of their itinerary in Chicago last week, speak prophetically.

Divine Plans Closing In.

They speak of a closing in of divine plans from the, to us, nebulous preparatory orderings of the centuries to a climacteric time of visible accomplishment of that for which the coming of Christ into the world in that day of old was divinely planned; that the world of men and women might become brothers and sisters—that thus the kingdom might come on the earth.

Quite readily can it be seen that the whole world may be reached by the Christian religion in our own generation.

Lately the government of Belgium has given to the Disciples of Christ the entreé to an immense section of Africa where millions of souls are waiting to be told of Christ. Nearby is our Dr. Dye, keeping his lonely vigil and waiting for the word of march.

The forbidden land of Tibet has quite recently laid off its age-old impenetrability, and our missionaries have already taken their initiatory steps toward going in and possessing the land for God.

These are the last dark spots upon our earth where the Christian religion has not been offered to the people.

In all this closing-in of plans—this coming to a focal point of the procession of events, women are having their part and it is a profoundly significant one.

Woman's Influence in Heathendom.

Early in the history of missionary efforts it became quite clear that there was an impassable wall between the men missionaries and a singularly powerful influence which, in a baffling way, was defeating the efforts of the workers,—it was the influence of the hidden women behind the curtains of the prison-like homes of non-Christian lands. Through all the centuries of incredible oppression and consequent non-development, these little sisters of ours in some unconscious way preserved their one jewel—the natural and indestructible influence which women have over the race.

The mothers of the world of men have a gift which can never be taken from them as long as they mother the race in the different womanly ways, the power of molding lives.

So that as the missionaries tried to lift men out of the power of degrading religions, they found that their efforts returned to them void—that ever their converts sank back as if a mill-stone were hanged about their neck,—they could not rise into the higher realm of a religion of fine ideals without their women rising with them. It was impossible.

Then it was that the call came to woman herself to lend that small hand of hers which is ever powerful for good or evil.

Christian Women's Success.

And she stretched forth her hand and God made it to be filled with power, and with gold and with the gladness of a great joy—the joy of life itself! And all this the extended hand has reached out to the little sisters of the far East for fifty years.

In this city's celebration of the Jubilee, Chicago church women wrought a great work, and proved again the might of the city's determinatory power.

Many things seemed to say the Jubilee couldn't be a success just at this time. But we have to report to the readers of The Christian Century a wonderful, a stirring, an inspiring success.

Under the general leadership of Mrs. Andrew McLeish, affairs were molded into fine shape, and the assistance of Mrs. Pooley, of the national committee on general arrangements, helped to move things along smoothly, together with the aid of such capable workers as Mrs. Linney, Mrs. Pellet, Mrs. Cooley, Mrs. Vickers and many other able women.

Meetings All Well Attended.

The mass meetings were well attended, running into thousands in the aggregate.

The Vinton moving picture lecture was attended by over 2,000 interested and delighted ticket holders in Orchestra Hall.

The drawing-room meetings were all successful, that of Mrs. W. R. Harper being the largest, but all were enthusiastic.

The luncheon was a revelation. Twelve hundred women entered into the fellowship of that occasion and it was a most happy and kindly social function, in spite of its bigness; everybody spoke to her neighbor in kindliest affection; denominational lines were fully forgotten in the great wave of purposeful kinship which came into the assembly on the wings of the one central and dominating intent which had brought this immense gathering of women together in the banquet room of the Auditorium Hotel.

Mrs. Montgomery's Inspiring Leadership.

While this fine spirit of unity filled the minds and hearts of the hundreds of women present, the profoundest depths of desire to enter more fully into woman's special service for God were stirred by the inspiring address of Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, who brought to her task the greatest amount of research, wisdom and convincingness, combined with a womanly sweetness and tact which wooed us into greater circles of thought and purpose before we were aware. And this was true of the many addresses which Mrs. Montgomery gave.

Our own Miss Florence Miller we found to be a most attractive and effective figure in the group of leaders. Our C. W. B. M. general board has sent her on this "ocean to ocean campaign" as a representative of our organization, and most wisely and sweetly is she performing her part. We are very proud of our representative.

It would be difficult to estimate the amount of money which these jubilee meetings will direct into the treasuries of the Chicago missionary societies.

Increased Offering for Treasury.

Between $30,000 and $40,000 has been reported to the committee which has the matter in charge, and it is thought the amount will reach $40,000 actually reported as a direct result, but the awakening of the money conscience, which is so lamentably dormant when it comes to furnishing the wherewithal for actual, active missionary work in the field,—the awakening into life of this dormant faculty will mean a "radio-activity" not to be measured.

Our own C. W. B. M. auxiliaries accepted a "Jubilee apportionment" of $2,000 and raised in individual gifts over and above this apportionment $2,000 more, making a sum of $4,000 from Chicago sacieties.

It was a matter of great joy and a source of inspiration to the Chicago women to hear the splendid report from Kansas City. They gave, in the aggregate (all churches), $50,000, of which $30,000 came from our own women of the Disciples' churches! This story was told in all of the Chicago mass meetings and without doubt raised the standard of giving appreciably here.

Our own report in Chicago of $4,000 showed the best offering of all the denominational mass-meetings. We want to emphasize the fine form of organization we have and we believe we have the best and most inspiring set of women on our National Board that there is in the country. This little bit of personal pride may be excused once in fifty years.

May the dignity and significance of women's work for women in Christian missions carry its appeal in the largest way to the hearts of thousands of women everywhere in this Jubilee year.

A Significant Service

The Cultivation of Christian Unity at the Lord's Table

BY DR. HUGH T. MORRISON, JR.

The Second Presbyterian Church of our city celebrated recently its seventy-fifth anniversary. The celebration lasted two weeks. The church is prosperous and housed in the best edifice in the city.

On Sunday afternoon of the final day of the celebration all protestant churches of the city, and their pastors were invited to join in a union communion service. Every pastor received a note from the minister of the Presbyterian church in which a sincere invitation was extended accompanied with a statement that the service was not for show or to glory over achievements, but for quiet, devout fellowship and worship.

A Communion Atmosphere.

About six hundred people were present. The assembly was quiet but not funereal. During the moments of assembling the notes of "Jerusalem the Golden" were softly and impressively played on the great organ. If one were not hushed before entering the church, the strains of music and the noble architecture at once quieted his soul, and one naturally settled down to meditation upon the tragedy of Calvary.

The minister introducing the service mentioned regrets received from three brother clergymen detained by important services elsewhere. A Disciple and a Baptist pastor and an Episcopalian rector were unavoidably absent but sent messages of greeting and good will.

Following this was the pastor's statement so familiar to Disciples. "I have no right to invite you to this table" he said, "It is our Lord's table and it is yours as well as mine. Long before this church was builded, or any church, it was given the disciples by our Master. We sit together today, you with as great right as I, to fellowship with Jesus about His table."

No choir was present. A precentor quietly led each inspiring hymn chosen with beautiful appropriateness.

Various Pastors Participating.

Seated around the table were about a dozen pastors representing Methodist, Presbyterion,Lutheran, Disciple and Congregational churches. Each had part in the service. With the exception of one who allowed himself to forget the occasion and delivered an address in stentorian tones and at too great length, all acquitted themselves in such manner as to add dignity and impressiveness to the service.

Four brief talks of from four to six minutes in length were made preceding the blessing of the emblems. Each speaker was thoroughly prepared so that he could say the thing appropriate to such an occasion and quit when it was said. Two Presbyterian ministers offered thanks for the emblems and a Presbyterian and Lutheran pastor presided at the table.

Service Beautifully Simple and Appropriate.

No offering was taken, and no irrelevant announcements made to detract from the spirit of the occasion. As soon as the elements were distributed the benediction was pronounced and the congregation dispersed in silence.

I am reporting the service for several reasons.

The service was beautiful in its simplicity and appropriateness. It gave first place to the passion of our Lord on Calvary. There was no desire to have the assembly photographed. It was too earnest and deep to admit any significant feature of it being reproduced in a picture. Its significance was not its bigness but its spiritual character. It was important not because a multitude had gathered, but because Christ was there. The sufferings of Calvary awakened penitence for our own sin which is a piece of all that sin that wrought the Master's crucifixion.

Unintentional Close Communion.

It was a unique experience to be invited to company with another body of Christians in this formal celebration of our Lord's death. Aside from the Disciples, all churches are really close communionists. Some denominations have been avowedly so, while others have been so for the most part unconsciously. If they are not exclusive they are at least seclusive in its observance. The members of other churches rarely know when communion day arrives in their sister churches. The sacramental feast is prepared with thought alone of the regular communicants of the church. If one be present on the day of its observance he will not be invited to leave. But in many churches there is no effort to make it easy for a stranger to participate. Often the congregation is dismissed to allow visitors to leave prior to the distribution of the elements. Or the service is held at a special afternoon hour and the minister or presiding elder invites the members to the altar, while the non-communicants feel a justifiable diffidence toward approaching the altar to receive the sacrament. A certain formality in the method of observance may prove forbidding to one not accustomed to that particular manner of procedure.

A Unique Event.

I recall no instance in my experience where another denomination has called together the various religious bodies of the city for a union communion service. Among the Disciples it is almost an invariable rule to hold such a service when our edifices are dedicated. We have believed that all Christ's disciples should be free to sit down together at His table and have sought the opportunity for practical expression of this belief. Such a service as I am describing can therefore be only an occasion of great gratitude to a Disciple.

This service seemed to me also one of those good omens witnessed today of the approaching unity of God's people, and an example of a very effectual method of hastening the fulfilment of our Lord's prayer.

Practicing Unity at the Lord's Table.

Discussing Christian union will not advance us as rapidly as practicing it around the communion table. Theological combats are repelling; the Lord's table is attractive. In theological discussion we assert "It is you!" At Jesus' table we ask "Is it I?" It is not easy to be satisfied with minor and insignificant issues when we have tried to appreciate the meaning of Calvary.

Any feeling of superiority on account of some fancied or real extra obedience will vanish when we reflect on our imperfection in the light of Jesus' supreme sacrifice.

A holy Presence will make us love the Lord's disciples in the Presbyterian and Methodist churches as profoundly as we love those in our own church.

When we see how easily and naturally Jesus oversteps all our artificial denominational bounds to eat and sup with his disciples, we will have little difficulty in finding our way across them too. It is never unsafe to follow where Jesus himself leads.

Springfield, Ill.

Organism vs. Organization

I read a book last week that moves me to make a remark or two. This book was written by a man who thinks he has solved all the problems of life. It is especially valuable because of the extent of the egotism of the author. It is not the first scheme that has been proposed for the settlement of the world's problems. It will probably not be the last one. I have no doubt but that I will write one or two myself before everything is finally settled. This man calls his book, "World Corporation." He says the settlement of all problems is a very simple matter. He proposes the formation of a "World Corporation." In fact, he has already organized it. It is to include all corporations of all nations of the earth. The plan is to sell shares in "World Corporation" at $1.00 a share, then go into the markets of the world and buy up railroad and mining stocks, and all other stocks and bonds; and keep at the matter until everything that is salable is purchased by "World Corporation." Of course, a man who would write a book of this kind would also settle the labor problem and the money question and the social issue and everything else. The only difficulty with the thing is, that it is like the man's perpetual motion machine, it won't work.

I smiled when I read the book, and you may laugh when you read about it, but the fact is it sounds a very important note in human life. We want to settle things. We want to form a nation that will never need to change. We are anxious to establish a church that will remain the same forever We demand a creed that needs no revision In other words, we want to fix things. We ignore the law of growth; get a hatchet and saw, and sometimes a meat-ax, and start out to build a world. The old theological theory was after this order. Fundamentally it meant, that one morning in the dawn of time, the Almighty stepped out on one corner of space, and with a hammer and nails and a saw made the universe. There never was a greater repudiation of the power of the Almighty than this piece of nonsense. Growth is the law of God in every world. From the smallest atom to the greatest star the law of growth is seen. From the unicel lular organism, so low in form and order, that no man can tell whether it is an animal or plant, to the soul of the Son of God, growth is the law of life. Why should puny man try to change it? But we do just the same.

I plead guilty to at least two experiences in repudiating the plan of God. Many years ago I became a school teacher. I introduced my work by spending two weeks in the County Institute. I listened to a course of lectures, on "How to Organize and Classify and Teach a Country School." I bought a book with this euphonious title, and felt that I was equipped for my work as a teacher. On the morning of the first day I was greeted by four little bare-footed boys and girls. I stood in their presence with my machine as powerless and more hopeless than either child. I made a solemn resolution then and there that I would never do anything in the school room according to a stereotyped plan if I could do it in any other way. Later I became a preacher. I felt as every young preacher does, that I must organize my church. I had no idea as to what this meant, but the church must be organized. So with the help of the printer I launched the movement. We got out a four-page leaflet putting all the prominent members of the church on important committees. The folder was a piece of art. It was a thing of beauty, but a joy for only a short time. I announced ex-cathedra, that we would have reports from all the committees at least once a month. Did the committees report? Not that anybody ever heard of. The last report I had was to the effect that the reports were not all in. But I was. I surrendered the plan in disgust. I made a solemn resolution then that I would never do anything in the church according to a stereotyped plan if I could do it in any other way. I may be a fool in some respects, but I am at least not this kind.

And now I come to the point of the parable This article began with an announcement about "Organism vs. Organization." Our Brotherhood needs to learn this lesson. We get into a great convention, have a few enthusiastic speeches, and proceed to organize something. I know for I have helped do it several times. Our past is filled with the wreckage of outgrown and abandoned organizations. But we still keep at it. If we could call the roll of the immature and amateur organizations we have started the mat ter would become exciting. The time has come for us to stop this "playing at it" and get down to business. The world cannot be saved by organization. This has been demonstrated a thousand times. The Roman Catholic Church is the best example of it in religion. The machine is too big. It takes too much energy to make the wheels go round.

But some one is ready to say, "How do you expect results without an organization?" And there is where the difference between organism and organization comes in. Life forms its own body, a body sufficient for its work. When we become thoroughly convinced of our duty on any question and have deep-seated convictions that we ought to do something, a way will be found. It will be the natural way. It will be life expressing itself. It will be organism instead of organization. Life cannot be created by organization, but will always express itself in a fitting body of organism. The life of God in the souls of men will express itself in such movements as will enable them to do the work of the Kingdom of God.

Christian union is a wonderful theme these days. But what do we mean by Christian union? Do we propose a vast ecclesiastical organization that will undertake to save the world by machinery? If we mean this, count my vote against the proposition. But if we mean to get the sons of men so full of the spirit of the Son of God that they will naturally come together as one body in Him, count me on the affirmative side. This is what the church and the world need.

Authority in Religion

Christ is the sole and only authority in His church. His rule shall not end until he has put down all other authority.

All authority is either external or internal. External authority rules by restraint, internal by its appeal to the heart and conscience of man. One may control a man by the fear of punishment, the other by the innate sense of right and wrong. An example of the former is the law, of the latter, the gospel. The frst was written on tables of stone, the latter upon the "fleshly tables of the heart." The one is literal, the other spiritual. The one is from Moses, the other from Christ. The authority exercised over a little child is external; when he is grown the parent must reason with him and govern from within.

Our heavenly father used external authority in the childhood days of the race but now he appeals to the heart, through the truth.

Truth needs no authority to enforce it. It is self-enforcing. Jesus did not teach as the scribes, using infallible texts, or exterior title. His own personality and the value of his words were sufficient. His truth stirred the hearts of men. His words fell upon their ears like the very words of God. They quickened the conscience—they caused men to cry out, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?

Christ's words do not come barking at your heels; they meet you face to face; you cannot push them aside; they block your way like the eternal hills. You may climb over them and go on but you will find them still standing there when you return to face your God.

Christianity then, has its authority. But where? The Romanist says in the church, the Protestant literalist says in the Bible, the Quaker says in the heart. Who is right? We say that all these speak with authority only as it is borrowed from Christ. These no more shine by their own light than does the moon. Augustine said: But for the authority of the Pope, I would not put the Bible above the Koran. And what is the church but the living teacher, teaching Christ in the present tense? And what is the Bible but the servant of its Master, a messenger carrying to poor lost sinners the saving knowledge of Jesus?

And what of the human heart? Is it not deceitful and desperately wicked? Is it safe to trust the Inner Light? Is this the voice of God, the only and ultimate authority in religion? My own heart does not bow down to these. Neither Romanism nor Protestantism; neither creed nor dogma; Christ is all for Christ is God.

He exercises all authority over his church. He is the head. He is the absolute monarch in His Kingdom.

He who speaks the words of Christ may speak with the same positiveness with which Paul spoke when he declared, "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other doctrine let him be anathema." Then may we set our faces like flint. Christianity is true, not because it is in the Bible, alone, but because it is in the heart of things. It regenerates the world. It works and subdues by love.

Said Luther: "The Bible being the servant and not the Master, need not be perfect." No one should lose faith in Christ because he cannot accept every word and sentence in the Bible.

The Bible has gone "through the mill" during the last century. It has been subjected to the criticisms of science and has been put to the test of human consciousness. Nevertheless it remains the bulwark of our faith. Let him annihilate the doctrine of literal infallibility of the Bible who will, our faith in Christ remains unshaken still.

Suppose we pass from the letter to the spirit mode of reviewing the Bible, is not Jesus still supreme? The issue of the ordeal that has so alarmed many of our brethren, has been after all the supreme exalting of Christ.

The church is His witness, the Bible is His witness, the heart of faith is His witness, the Spirit is His witness, He is over all, and He speaks through all.

Be not alarmed. The perpetuation of divine truth by external authority may be your idea, but if it should chance to be that external authority was only the scaffolding, the death knell of the church has not been sounded. The scaffolding may fall that the real beauty of the temple may greet the eye of the beholder

Let us speak out of Him, whose authority is neither ecclesiastical nor official but moral and spiritual. Would to God that the preachers of my day and generation would cease defending creeds and theological systems, and seek to know Jesus only, and to do His will.

"All hail the power of Jesus' name" might then become the universal anthem of the church.

Call for "Peace Sunday"

The third Sunday in December has been set apart as Peace Day for churches of all names and creeds. Benjamin F. Trueblood, secretary of the American Peace Society, has been joined by a group of distinguished men in calling the churches to observe that day. Among others are the names of Cardinal Gibbons, Bishops Mallalieu, Cranston and Fitzgerald, Rev. Russell H. Conwell, Rev. Charles F. Dole, Rev. James L. Barton and Rev. Arthur J. Brown. "All the nations," their appeal says, "especially all the nations of Christendom, are in closer touch with each other than at any previous time in the world's history.

"Surely it is high time that we should all unite in a supreme effort to find a better way of settling international contentions and disagreements than by the wicked waste of untold wealth and the wholesale slaughter of human beings.

"In such a crisis as this, when the movement for world arbitration and peace has made such enormous progress both among the masses of people and in the governments themselves, the religious press, the clergy of every Christian church, all leaders of religious organizations and all patriots and philanthropists ought most cordially to unite. and with earnest, persistent and wisely-directed efforts strive, in all legitimate ways, to bring about a condition of affairs that shall eventually make wars between the nations an utter impossibility, and put a stop to this present irrational and burdensome rivalry in armaments.

"To this end we most respectfully urge the clergy of all the Christian churches, and the leaders of all other religious organizations, to observe the third Sunday of December of each year as Peace Sunday, or some other Sunday if this is not convenient, and in song and prayer and reading of the Scriptures, and especially in the sermon, to advocate the abolition of war and the substitution of imperative, universal arbitration, and thus secure world-wide peace; and so fill the world with security, comfort and permanent deliverance from the terrible sufferings and the awful destruction of life and property incident to all wars."

"I heard what you said," he observed, "But yore givin' yoreself a bum steer. I've knowed that man fer years. I never had to break with him afore tonight, an' I'm sorry I hed to do it. The boys ull tel you that I hev some reppitation from Dawson City to Reno. I've met gun-fighters an' knife-slingers of both sexes an' severeal complexions. My nerve is steady, son. But the man we crost tonight is as bad as I've seen. We done him a favor, fer ef he'd lost the boat I know what ol' General Sternberg at Manila would ha' done to him. But he haint the grateful kind. Look out fer him sharp. He's a strong hater an' he's got it in fer ye."

CHAPTER IV.

"The Hero is Sentenced on Calle Real."

Like all men worth while, Rainier was a man of imagination and had pictured himself arriving in Ilo-Ilo in a rather definite mental sketch. He had seen himself first viewing the town from the bulwarks of the "Hyson," then saying a warm farewell to Alaska and going ashore with his papers and reporting to the military commander—thereafter becoming a rather conspicuous citizen of the community as upon past occasions in other war-zones. Truth altered this somewhat.

Six days after leaving Nagasaki he had crawled out on the beach of Ilo-Ilo Strait with the last energy of a terrible battle with the night-darkened waters, and was dragged up beyond the reach of the malignant undertow by the scurviest looking individual that he had ever seen. However, that didn't trouble him, for he went into nothingness for something less than a millennium and then awoke to as evil a situation as a recently puffed and petted journalist could desire. When his senses returned the scurvy individual also seemed to return and it was as Rainier looked up into his haggard but good-humored countenance that he delivered himself of the inevitable question.

"What's happened?" he asked, finding only half of his voice present.

"Search me," grinned his keeper. "Somebody slugged yo' an' floated yo' off fo' daid, Ah reckon."

The prostrate man's eyes noted that he was lying in a bamboo shack. The air was torrid. Outside, the surf was gently snoring. The sun was glimmering at a thousand crevices in the nipa wall.

He raised his arm with infinite labor and found his head big with a clumsy bandage. Then his eye rested with more care upon the unwashed Samaritan above him.

"We had just made the Ilo-Ilo lights; I was leaning over the rail. I think I fell overboard, for I remember a swim that seemed interminable. How long have I lain here? All night?"

"Six days, seh."

"Heavens! What a bore to you! I'm a newspaper man—Rainier. I'm under obligation to you. Your name?"

The slouching figure at the cot's side half straightened. The red-rimmed eyes in the unshaven, greasy face betokened hesitation. Then the sensual lips spoke and Rainier caught the words.

"Back home they call me Rod—Rod Garrison. Out heah it's shawtened to 'Bino.'" Rainier's gaze fastened on a blue flannel shirt.

"In the Service?" he asked.

"Not now, seh. Ahm a beach-combeh. How's yo' haid feel? Ah reckon th' fellah who gave yo' that blow had re-infoced fingehs."

Rainier lay quiet a moment, closing his eyes to the meanness of his surroundings. Weak, and conscious of a dully aching head, he was endeavoring to recall the circumstances surrounding his mysterious fall over the side of the "Hyson." But his weary mind refused to aid him.

Garrison had turned from him to bend over an evil-odored kitchen-mess.

"My papers were buttoned in an inner pocket of my blouse," suggested Rainier.

"Nothing in yo' cloes when yo' came paddlin' in."

"No gold in my belt?"

"Yo' belt was gone, seh."

Rainier's philosophy began to form.

"Tough outfit on boad th' transport?" queried the beach-comber.

"No, a good class of men."

"Yo' must have made an enemy aw two then. They come up behin' yo', knocked yo' senseless, robbed yo' an' threw yo' oveh."

Rainier looked up sharply at his host. His mind had fastened on the angry words of the doctor on the ship's ladder in Nagasaki. But he shook himself loose from his suspicion. Surely no man would attempt murder to revenge an indignity practiced upon him for his own good. No, some sea-criminal of the forecastle had evidently caught the gleam of the correspondent's money and risked a halter to get it.

To sum up, then, a broken head, an empty pocket, and the necessity of introducing himself under serious disadvantages to Ilo-Ilo society.

Rainier had come back to consciousness somewhere in the mid-morning. Closing his eyes again he dreamily listened to his companion stirring about the shack. Shortly he fell asleep in spite of the increasing heat beating through his shaky shelter. When next he awoke he realized it to be afternoon. As he stirred hopefully and stretched his limbs, Garrison appeared above him with a white bowl, steaming and spiced. Shortly he was feeding himself chicken broth, the huge spoon trembling from the bowl to his mouth and back again, each trip an experiment. An hour later actually found him helped into his clothes by Garrison, who had tried in vain to dissuade him from dressing. Dressed, he found himself too strengthless to walk, but sat perspiring with weakness on the edge of his cot collecting additional facts from his host to aid him in getting his bearings. The "Hyson," it appeared, was now in the Sulu Archipelago, having steamed south two days after making Ilo-Ilo, leaving behind a mountain of yellow pine cases, a half hundred mules and a few miscellaneous human units on the Ilo-Ilo wharves.

"Did a man calling himself Benson-Alaska Benson, look me up?"

"Why, Ah hevn't repo'ted yo' yet to the Provo'," said Garrison, rather slowly. "Ah'm not in very good standing at haidquahtehs. Ah reckon ah ought to hev tol' about yo' but ah'm tryin' to he'p the Provo' to forgit me. We ah some distance out the limits, as yo' can see fo' yo'se'f."

Rainier had noted this fact through the windows. With reviving interest in life he had looked along a lonely beach fringed with cocoanut palms, seeing in the distance a helter-skelter of tile and corrugated iron roofing that he surmised must be Ilo-Ilo itself. He was looking at the rather meager effect as Garrison answered him and turned back to search more keenly the features of the beach-comber.

"I say, you didn't take French leave of your regiment?" he asked sharply, for he had taken a fancy to the shiftless man in his greasy semi-uniform.

"A yeah ago you'd hed to fight me fo' that," drawled Garrison. "But Ah kin fo'git easy nowadays. Climate'll change yo' code so yo' cain't recognize hit."

"Your pardon, Garrison," said Rainier, remorsefully. "I should have—I did read you better. The truth is I feel knit to you for the best reason on earth and I'm jealous of the records of my friends."

Garrison's words had been passionless, but a fire had slumbered in his eyes as he had answered. The gleam quenched in returning listlessness as he went on.

"No, seh, Ah ain't neveh pulled down my swearin' hand. I've got some papuhs somewhahs in this ole shack. No, seh, the explanation of what yo' read in my face is mighty simple. 'Bino' is the magic word. It conveys nothin' to yo' as yet, Misteh Rainier, but afteh yo' hev campaigned oveh this Gawd-depahted dump heap for a yeah an' so yo'll undehstan' the profound meanin' of my revelation. 'Bino,' seh, is a lyin' promise of heaven sandwiched into a double-barreled hell. 'Bino' is a suicide's accelerator, a cause fo' divo'ce, a stomach rot, an' a brain stew. Compa'ed to hit, whiskey is face-wash an' absinthe is soothin' syrup."

"Throw it over!" said the correspondent sternly.

The beach-comber's only response was a shrug, a movement half of indifference, half of despair.

Rainier started in with an impatient remonstrance, but stopped in the middle of his sentence. A suddenly audible murmur of voices outside had floated in to him. Almost instantly the shack door was pushed in with a careless crash and a boy-faced American sprang into the little room. He was clad in natty khaki and was closely followed by two blue-bloused soldiers with rifles.

"You're under arrest, my man," said the officer in a tone that he evidently held down to snappy professionalism with an effort. He addressed Garrison, whose face did not change from the look of careless cynicism brought out by his conversation with Rainier.

"He'p yo'se'f, Provo, he'p yo'se'f," he said with ironic hospitality, languidly arising.

The officer was now eying Rainier with some surprise. Rainier felt no necessity of arising and remained seated on the cot, gazing calmly up into the Provo-Marshall's face. There was something of a contrast between the red-faced boy officer, fresh from "The Point," fairly creaking in his starched khaki case, and the pale young man of the world in his soiled and shrunken suit of grey.

Garrison became momentarily alert.

"Lieutenant Lately, my friend Misteh Rainier of Seattle."

The lieutenant did not acknowledge the introduction.

"Have you a sedula?" he said abruptly.

"No," answered the correspondent. "What is it?"

"A pass—a certificate of registration."

There was a touch of impatience in the explanation.

Here Garrison broke in with, "Allow me to explain Misteh Rainier's presence seh."

"I am capable of examining the man," said the officer. "A beach-comber's word don't go far with my office. No, not a word. Corporal, remove the prisoner."

Garrison, still endeavoring to explain, was roughly shoved through his own door and was received with a cheerful sound of laughter outside, where, Rainier judged by the noisy reception, that a strong detachment was gathered. He heard their good-natured jeers at his host.

"The cat came back!" "Bino Bill, th' Bottle Buster."

Apparently the Provo-guard had met Garrison before.

"Now explain yourself," directed the Provo-Marshal curtly.

Disregarding the note in the officer's voice that betrayed delight in a little brief authority, Rainier gave the barest possible outline of the facts explanatory of his presence on Ilo-Ilo beach. Every sentence hardened the look of suspicion on the lieutenant's face. At the rather lame finish he said abruptly,

"No papers to identify you?"

"Naturally, none. Garrison will substantiate the latter part of what I have told you. My mail will arrive shortly and satisfy you fully."

"I'm satisfied now," said the officer coldly. "I have orders to clean up this beach and I'm not going to let a pipe-dream like that fool me. Sorry, my man, but you'll have to come with us. Corporal (he raised his voice), line up this beach-comber with the rest."

More amused than indignant, Rainier went, weak but smiling, out into the sunlight, to be baptized in the curiosity of a dozen soldiers and a group of dejected natives. For an instant he felt the possibility of a dramatic deliverance. There were at least four regiments in the American army somewhere in the Philippines with whom he had campaigned in Cuba and Porto Rico. But the Provost-Guard were all labeled with the insignia of the Sixty-First, a regiment utterly strange to him. Had it not been for his exasperating weakness he would have felt even more cheerful. But his uncovered head, dizzy with his long illness, felt the glare of the terrible sun with his first overwhelming reminder that he was under a tropic sky.

The nearest soldier noticed his uncertain step and the hand involuntarily raised to his head. He stepped up to Rainier.

"Where's your cover, old man?"

Noteworthy Steps Toward Unity

Three Important Actions on Church Unity Taken Last Month

The Episcopalians

A CONFERENCE ON UNITY.

(Action taken at Cincinnati.)

Your committee is of one mind. We believe that the time has now arrived when representatives of the whole family of Christ, led by the Holy Spirit, may be willing to come together for the consideration of questions of faith and order. We believe, further, that all Christian communions are in accord with us in our desire to lay aside self-will and to put on the mind which is in Jesus Christ, our Lord. We would heed this call of the Spirit of God in all lowliness and with singleness of purpose. We would place ourselves by the side of our fellow-Christians looking not only on our own things, but also on the things of others, convinced that our one hope of mutual understanding is in taking personal counsel together in the spirit of love and forbear ance. It is our conviction that such a conference for the purpose of study and discussion, without power to legislate or to adopt resolutions, is the next step toward unity.

With grief for our aloofness in the past and for other faults of pride and self-sufficiency which make for schism, with loyalty to the truth as we see it and with respect for the convictions of those who differ from us, holding the belief that the beginnings of unity are to be found in the clear statement and full consideration of those things in which we differ, as well as of those things in which we are as one, we respectfully submit the following resolution:

Whereas, there is today among all Christian people a growing desire for the fulfill ment of our Lord's Prayer that all his disciples may be one, that the world may believe that God has sent him:

Resolved, the House of Bishops concurring, that a joint commission be appointed to bring about a conference for the consideration of questions touching faith and order, and that all Christian communions throughout the world which confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior be asked to unite with us in arranging for and conducting such a conference. The commission shall consist of seven bishops appointed by the chairman of the House of Bishops and seven presbyters and seven laymen appointed by the president of the House of Deputies, and shall have power to add to its number and to fill any vacancies occurring before the next general convention.

The Congregationalists

STRONG FRATERNAL RESOLUTIONS.

(Action taken at Boston.)

Whereas the last Lambeth Conference of the Anglican Communion which was held in London in 1908 lifted up the ideal of church unity in these words: "We must set before us the Church of Christ as he would have it, one spirit and one body, enriched with all those elements of divine truth which the separated communities of Christians now emphasize separately, strengthened by the interaction of all the gifts and graces which our divisions now hold asunder, filled with all the fulness of God, we dare not, in the name of peace, barter away those precious things of which we have been made stewards. Neither can we wish others to be unfaithful to trusts which tney hold no less sacred. We must fix our eyes on the church of the future which is to be adorned with all the precious things, both theirs and ours. We must constantly desire, not compromise, but comprehension, not uniformity, but unity."

And whereas the Anglican bishops further recommended that for this end conference of ministers and laymen of different Chris tian bodies be held to promote a better mutual understanding; and we on our part would seek, as much as lieth in us, for the unity and peace of the whole household of faith; and, forgetting not that our forefathers, whose orderly ministry is our inheritance, were not willingly separatists, we would loyally contribute the precious things, of which as Congregationalists we are stewards, to the church of the future; therefore this council would put on record its appreciation of the spirit and its concurrence in the purpose of this expression of the Lambeth Conference; and voice its earnest hope for closer fellowship with the Episcopal Church in Christian work and worship.

It is further recommended this matter be referred to the committee on overtures from the Episcopal Church to act as our representatives in carrying out the spirit and in furthering the intent of this resolution.

It was voted that in view of the possibility of fraternal discussion of Church Unity suggested by the Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops, 1908, a special commission of five representatives be appointed to consider any overtures that may come to us as a result of this conference.

The Disciples of Christ

A COUNCIL ON CHRISTIAN UNION.

(Action taken at Topeka, Kans.)

An organization to be called The Council on Christian Union was formed, whose purposes as stated in its constitution are:

First—To create and distribute literature bearing on Christian union among the people of our own and other religious bodies, and to solicit and hold in trust funds for this purpose.

Second—To arrange conferences in important centers on the subject of Christian union

Third—To prepare and send to all religious peoples an address reciting the great cardinal principles of our movement, and urging the vital importance of Christian union if we are to conquer the world for Christ.

The address of the President of the American Christian Missionary Society, which occasioned the above organization is epitomized as follows:

"I believe as you believe that we have the greatest message ever given to the world. The time has come when we should propagate it or quit it. We have been content to be isolated from the other churches all these years but I believe we were wrong in keeping to ourselves. We should let the world know the message that we have. There are three steps that I believe we should take.

"First, we should put out a definite propaganda. We should send literature embodying our views to every minister in this country every month or at least once a quarter.

"Second, there should be a monthly maga zine as a clearing house for thought on Christian union. Its pages should be open for discussion by any reputable minister or layman of any church but its editorial policy should be steadfastly in line with the principles of the Disciples of Christ. This maga zine should serve to bring our platform before the divided church of God.

"Third, the time has come when we have got to change our attitude toward our religious brethren. Sometimes it has looked as if we regarded the Methodists and Presbyterians and the others as enemies. We can t win them by throwing stones at them but we can win them by love. We should regard them as brothers. If they deny it, we should claim it still, and if they deny it again, we should go on claiming them as brothers. The baptismal question is not as large a question as once it seemed. Thomas Campbell's plea was to unite the world."

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

Theme for the Day.—The City of God.

Scripture.—Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city.—Isa. 52:1.

And I saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, made ready as a bride adorned for her husband.—Rev. 21:2.

City of God, how broad and far
  Outspread thy walls sublime!
The true thy chartered freemen are
  Of every age and clime.

One holy church, one army strong,
  One steadfast high intent,
One working band, one harvest song,
  One King Omnipotent!
    —Samuel Johnson "City of God.")

Prayer.—Father of infinite mercy, let Thy blessing rest upon the church throughout the world. Heal its divisions, and give its members of every name and company, the spirit of love and brotherhood. Help us to advance the oneness of the body of Christ by cultivating the graces of good will and appreciation, and by co-operation for all holy ends with those who love our Lord Jesus in sincerity. Hasten the day, we beseech Thee, when the war of creeds shall cease and the strife of opinions shall vex the church no more.—Amen.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

Theme for the Day.—The Joy of Humble Goodness.

Scripture.—I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving. The meek have seen it, and are glad: Ye that seek after God, let your heart live.—Psa. 69:30-32.

For Jehovah, taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation.—Psa. 149:4.

Thy soul was like a Star, and dwelt apart:
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea:
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free.
So thou didst travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.
    —Wordsworth ("Milton.")

Prayer.—Good Father, it is good for us to feel Thy nearness, for then our hearts are comforted and we cease to fret ourselves with the strife of the world. We find inspiration in the lives of those who have walked in humble ways, and yet found the days full of sweet and solemn joy. Teach us the lesson of contentment. Save us from the worry of unsuitable desires. Enrich us with the graces of Thy children who have lived in the sunlight of Thy love, and make us worthy of nobler tasks in the life to come.—Amen.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

Theme for the Day.—The Lost Son.

Scripture.—And the son said unto him. Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight; I am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth quickly the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet.—Luke 15:21-22.

Sad penitent, beloved of God thou art,
  Thy wandering feet He welcomes home at night—
More dear than those who never did depart
  Is the returning sinner, to His sight.
—Louise Chandler Moulton ("The Prodigal.")

Prayer.—O Thou who dost welcome to Thy heart all who in penitence and faith turn their homeward steps to Thee, hear our prayer for all who strayed from the way of good, and are living in the far country. Bring them to themselves again, and kindle within their souls such discontent and longing that they may turn from self and sin and take their way back to the Father's house. And when we pray this prayer, we pledge Thee our efforts to bring its answer. For we know that only thus can we pray aright. Turn our own hearts more fully to Thee, and welcome us at last to the Home eternal. For Jesus' sake.—Amen.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

Theme for the Day.—Nature's Voices—and God's.

Scripture.—The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge.—Psa. 19:1-2.

Who maketh winds his messengers; flames of fire his ministers.—Psa. 104:4.

My soul, wait thou in silence for God only; for my expectation is from him.—Psa. 62:5.

The silent skies are full of speech
  For who hath ears to hear;
The winds are whispering each to each,
The moon is calling to the beach,
And stars their sacred wisdom teach
  Of Faith, and Love, and Fear.
    —Phillips Brooks ("A Carol.")

Prayer.—O Thou, who hearest all our words, and understandest our thoughts afar off, grant us, we pray, that quietness of soul in which the divine message may be heard. May we learn to shut out from our lives for some small part of each day all voices but thine own. In the secret place comfort us until our troubles vanish away; in the cleft of the rock hide us until the storm be overpast. So may all solitude grow precious to us as it brings us nearer Thee, and all loneliness be banished in the joy and light of Thy countenance.—Amen.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 24

(Thanksgiving Day.)

Theme for the Day.—The Nation's Cause for Gratitude.

Scripture.—Ye shall divide the land for inheritance, and ye shall inherit it, one as well as another; for I swear to give it unto your fathers; and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance.—Ezek. 47:13-14.

When our sons shall be as plants grown up in their youth, and our daughters as cornerstones hewn after the fashion of a palace; when our garners are full, affording all manner of store, happy is the people that is in such a case; yea, happy is the people whose God is Jehovah.—Psa. 144: 12, 13, 15.

O beautiful for spacious skies,
  For amber waves of grain,
For purple mountain majesties
  Above the fruited plain!
  America! America!
    America! America!
God shed His grace on thee,
  And crown thy good with brotherhood
    From sea to shining sea!
—Katherine Lee Bates ("A New America.")

Prayer.—Lord, we thank Thee that after the custom of our fathers we observe this day of thankfulness. Thou hast been very good to us. The blessings of the year have been abundant. From scourge and pestilence, from storm and flood, from war and turbulence, Thou hast protected us. With abundant harvests, growing cities, and increasing resources Thou hast enriched us. We would acknowledge Thy providence in all these things. We would recognize Thy hand in all our national experiences. Save us, we beseech Thee, from ungodliness and unbelief, and may our nation bear to the other peoples of the earth a living testimony to the love of peace and righteousness throughout the world. We ask for Thy name's sake.—Amen.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

Theme for the Day.—The Conquest of Trouble.

Scripture.—But the salvation of the righteous is of Jehovah; He is their stronghold in the time of trouble.—Psa. 37:39.

These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye may have peace. In the world ye have tribulation; but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.—John 16:33.

When troubles march to meet you,
  Salute them at the door.
Extend both hands to greet them,
  Their worst will soon be o'er.
Beat down their stormy bugles
  With your rejoicing drums,
And, mailed in lofty courage,
  Accept whatever comes.
—Margaret E. Sangster ("A Little Help.")

Prayer.—Holy Father, Thou art our portion in life, and our exceeding great reward. In Thy good pleasure we would pass all our days. In the strength Thou dost supply, we would meet all the troubles that oppose us. For Thy grace can sustain us in every time of need. Deliver us, we beseech Thee, from fear, from worry, and from an unquiet mind. Grant us the peace of soul that keeps us firm in trial, and the faith that overcomes the world. May life, with all it brings of good and evil, be but the school in which we prepare for the higher life to come. We pray in Jesus' name.—Amen.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26.

Theme for the Day.—The Beauty of Advancing Old Age.

Scripture.—In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows shall be darkened; before the silver cord is loosed, or the golden bowl is broken, or the pitcher is broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.—Eccl. 12:3-6.

Your old men shall dream dreams.—Joel 2:28.

Still as the silver cord gets worn and slender,
  Its lightened task-work tugs with lessening strain,
Hands get more helpful, voices, grown more tender,
  Soothe with their softened tones the slumberous brain.

Youth longs and manhood strives, but age remembers,
  Sits by the raked-up ashes of the past,
Spreads its thin hands above the whitening embers
  That warm its creeping life-blood till the last.
    —Holmes ("The Iron Gate.")

Prayer.—Our loving Father, we thank Thee that as life goes onward to its maturity our sense of Thy presence grows more vivid and

What I Saw From My Window

The telegraph pole is a mast,
  And the cloud is a misty sail;
And yon great star is the lantern fast
  That tempests cannot pale.

Oh! where does the dream-ship drift,
  With my cherished dead on board?
Yon close-shut heaven reveals no rift
  Of that country unexplored.

But surely on their way
  Does Faith, like a lantern shine,
And blue seas of God's providence
  Bear up their bark and mine.

The Absent Member

BY HILDA RICHMOND.

Nearly every farm home in these progressive days has one or more absent members, and it is interesting to know how they are treated by the home folks. Perhaps the sons and daughters have gone to the city and towns to work, or it may be they have married and settled in homes of their own, but certain it is that most family circles are incomplete. Of course in the case of a newly wedded pair with perhaps one or more little ones, every member is present, but children grow up rapidly and soon leave the home nest.

Recently a lady died suddenly on a farm, and it was with the greatest difficulty her son could be found in time for the funeral. They knew, or thought they knew he was in a certain city, and that was all. In all the months he had been absent they had not exchanged more than one or two letters apiece, yet he was grief-stricken at the thought of her death. This seems like an impossible case, but many people know of duplicates all because of carelessness in letter writing. In the face of the fact that life is extremely uncertain people neglect to write to the absent members, and the members away from home are just as neglectful until some sorrow renders writing impossible forever.

In direct contrast to this is the case of an elderly couple who write to and receive letters from every absent member of the family once each week. The county papers follow the absent ones to their distant homes, kodak pictures tell of the improvements and changes in the farm home and in every way the absent ones are kept in touch with the old home. In this home, writing letters is a pleasant pastime instead of the dreaded task some people term it. There was a time when it was argued that country people had not much interest in letter writing because of the distance to the post office, but now that rural free delivery has come to stay that excuse is void.

Sometimes the absent member is not so far away as to preclude frequent visits, and in this way letters and papers are not so necessary. But even where this is the case the people away from home like to be remembered. A young girl working away from home—a teacher in the public school of a near by town—frequently ran home to stay over Sunday during good weather, but was shut in during the winter months because her home was several miles from the station and it was a task to get her to the early train, besides running the risk of its being too late when snow and ice delayed traffic. A visitor at the farm home asked for and obtained permission to pack a basket for the young lady and the mother was surprised to see what went into it. Every corner and crevice was packed with sugar cookies, a fried chicken, several glasses of clear jelly, some fruit cake and a little jar of home made butter. The absent member laughed and cried over the gift, and the mother was provoked with herself to think a visitor had to show her how to do this simple act of kindness.

An old lady who raised nine children and lived to see them all settled in homes of their own made an annual tour of their homes, staying from three to five days in each place. After her fall work was well out of the way she would leave her home in charge of a relative and make the rounds before winter set in, thus keeping in touch with the absent ones. The children came home often, especially on holidays, and in this way she had a good visit with each one undisturbed.

If you have a boy in college, go to see him, and if your daughter has left home, against your wishes to be a stenographer, visit her and let her know you still keep her in loving remembrance. It is unfortunate for elderly people to get the habit of staying at home year in and year out as if they owed no duty to friends and relatives.

So, instead of lamenting, when the birds hop out of the home nest one by one, keep in touch with them, by writing, visiting, and every other means possible. If they were at home you would not go month after month without speaking to them, so hunt up the pen and ink and set to work. Subscribe for the home paper to send them and keep them informed as to what is going on in the home world. If you take a premium on the colt at the county fair or entertain the sewing circle or somebody tried to break into the smoke house, tell them about it just as you would if they were at home. Never get too busy or too lazy to keep them in mind in the best manner you know of for it pays to remember the absent ones.

The Owl and the Boy

I am a barn owl, and so far as chickens are concerned, I never meddle with them. In fact, if a good fat pullet should come to me and ask to be eaten, I should bow my thanks and send her away. The fact that I am a barn owl and not a hooting woods owl, ought to be known to every farmer's son, but some of them are too stupid to learn natural history.

Such a one came into the barn where I was stopping the other day. I had entered the place the night before and caught four fat mice and a big rat. After devouring them, I flew up to roost on a big beam and went to sleep. When night came again, I was to go for more rats and mice, and if left alone for a week or so, I would clean the barn of vermin and make the farmer rejoice.

I was sound asleep and having a pleasant dream, when the barn doors banged open and a boy about fifteen years old banged in. He went kicking things about, and whistling as he kicked, and by and by he happened to look up and see me.

"Whew! but there's an owl!" he shouted, at the top of his voice.

"Well, what of it?" I asked, as I looked down at him.

"But I've got to have your life!"

"Why?"

"Because you are a bird—because you are an owl.'

"But I am a barn owl, and live on rats and mice."

"That makes no difference," he said, and went hunting for missiles to throw at me.

He did throw at me a couple of times and then, as he was stooping over for the third time, I flew for him and alighted on his head. I gave him a couple of sharp digs with my claws, and then fastened them into his cap and flew out of the door and away to another barn. I heard him shouting and calling, but I did not look back. I have his cap yet, and if I write as well as some of the boys and girls that read this page, I should put the following advertisement in the papers:

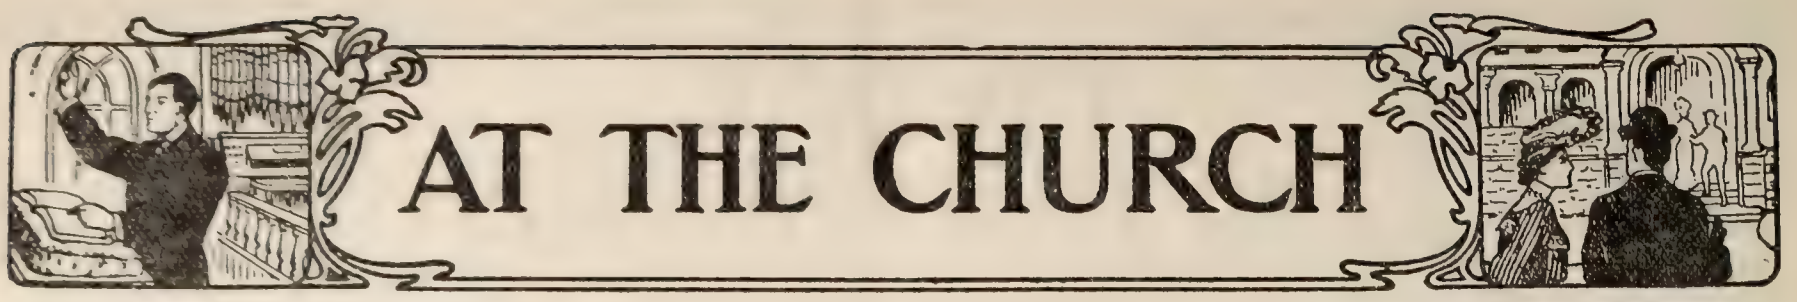
"If the stupid boy that didn't know the difference between a barn owl and a chicken stealer, will read up on natural history and beg my pardon besides, his cap will be left at his father's kitchen door the first dark night after this."—Unidentified.

The Wind's Song To a Child

Hurrah for the lad
  In breeches clad,
And a blouse like a sailor-man!
  The boy for me
  Is such as he—
I will give him a coat of tan!

How the ribbons flap
  On his sailor's cap
As if they would blow away!
  His curly head
  Looks well in bed,
I will give him a nap each day.

He's never afraid
  Of man or maid—
In that he is just like me.
  The water moans
  When he throws in stones—
We are one when he smites the sea.



So hurrah for the lad
  In breeches clad,
And a blouse like a sailor true!
  He's brave, he's free,
  He resembles me—
I love him enough for two.

our need of Thee greater. In the assured comfort of Thy love may we accept without regret the changes that the years may bring. Enable us to enrich our lives with the graces of gentleness, moderation and serenity, that we may prove, in our later years, a benedic tion to those who love us. And at last admit us into the richer life of Heaven. For Thy name's sake.—Amen.

Jesus and the Rulers

It appears from our sources regarding the arrest and execution of Jesus that the good fortune which fell to the lot of the Jewish authorities, in having a member of Jesus' own circle offer to deliver him into their hands for a stipulated price, was sudden and unexpected. They hardly knew just how to take the fullest advantage of their unlooked-for opportunity. Their immediate purpose therefore was to secure the person of Jesus, and then to plan how best they could accomplish his condemnation before the regular Roman tribunal.

They knew well enough that they had no power to deal with him by themselves. To be sure they could have assassinated him secretly, or secured his death by some sudden outbreak of mob violence, as they did in the case of Stephen later, and were almost successful in doing on the day of Paul's arrest. But they had not quite learned these expedients as yet. Then, too, the city was filled with people who had known of Jesus' work in Galilee, and might be supposed to play the part of friends if any open act of violence was planned against so popular a leader.

In the House of Annas.

Therefore they hurried him away, as the night drew to its close, and brought him first to the home of Annas or Hannan, the old man who administered the office of high priest, either personally or through other members of his family, for so many years. He was no longer high priest, having been deposed by the Romans upon chcarges which they thought adequate for his removal. But the priesthood still remained in his family in the person of Joseph Caiaphas, his son-in-law.

Annas was therefore virtually and in popular regard the real high priest, though another occupied the public position. The narrative of this preliminary hearing before the old man is given to us only in the fourth Gospel. The fact that it is omitted from the synoptic narratives is probably due to the official character of the hearing before Caiaphas, while the earlier trial was regarded as only a preliminary interview.

Of course it was the purpose of these Jewish questionings to bring out some admission on the part of Jesus that could be construed as a confession sufficient to warrant the violence which they meditated against him. It may be supposed that they went over every item of his public ministry as they knew it, with the purpose of entangling him in some manner in his statements, much as a shrewd lawyer or a police official would do who is trying to secure a confession by dextrous questioning. brow beating and intimidation. To much of this inquiry Jesus maintained only silence. After asserting that they knew quite fully his manner of life, the character of his teachings, and the lives of his intimate friends, he knew it was useless to go further in the attempt to make them understand. Indeed he saw from the first that his death had been determined upon. They had no intention of weighing the merits of his case, but only of finding some grounds for condemning him under the Jewish and the Roman law.

Plans for Condemnation.

They intended to take him before the procurator Pilate for the final hearing and condemnation. They proposed to charge him with being a leader of sedition, a pretender to political power and therefore an enemy of the emperor. Whether they could convince Pilate of this charge remained to be seen. But they intended to use their utmost efforts of persuasion and threat, and they thought they understood the type of man they had to deal with in the plastic and vacillating Roman.

The condemnation of Jesus before their own tribunal, the sanhedrin, was much easier to accomplish. There everything was in their own hands. Still they must have some plausible charge to make against the Nazarene. The plea that they intended to make before Pilate would of course be ridiculous if urged in a Jewish court. The hatred they had for the harsh government of Rome would have made popular any man who attempted to take measures for a popular uprising against the Roman power. Such a man would have been hailed as a hero by the Jewish race. Indeed the chief grievance that Jesus' most intimate friends had against his program was that it did not contemplate just such a rebellion against the hated foreigners.

False Witness.

The condemnation of Jesus before the Jewish court must be based on some real or pre tended violation of the Jewish laws. Many who volunteered to bear witness against him came without being able to present anything upon which even a distorted charge could be based. Of course the Jewish authorities did not deliberately seek false witnesses, but in the minds of the evangelists who wrote the narrative any testimony that bore against the spotless character of the Master seemed nothing less than vicious and deliberate falsehood.

At last two men were produced who agreed on the main facts of a story concerning the prisoner. They said he had made public boast of the fact that he would tear down the temple and rebuild it in three days. It was not so much the assumption of power to perform this impossible feat which formed their accusation, as it was the impiety and sacrilege of even intimating that anything could ever happen to mar the beauty or interfere with the usefulness of the sacred building, which was the center of all their pride as a nation. No doubt some word of Jesus regarding the downfall of the temple in the future was the basis of this charge. He must have intimated, as Stephen did later, that the time would come when the temple would cease to have its present value, and would indeed pass away. This statement combined with some reference to his own death and resurrection may well have provided just enough truth to give currency to the charge against him.

Jesus was unmoved by these accusations, and maintained his silence even when questioned by the presiding officer. The charge itself was so unconvincing that it fell of its own weight. The authorities were desperate; something must be done. Even their consciences demanded some accusation that would bear the test of inquiry.

The Verdict and the Violence.

At last the high priest, working himself to a passion in the emergency, demanded of Jesus if he had not claimed to be the Son of God. The fact that this question came after every other had failed seems to show how trivial the Jews themselves regarded it. It was only by putting a construction upon the words quite foreign to the usual Jewish habit of thinking that anything savoring of impiety could be discovered in the statement of Jesus that he was the Son of God. Israel as a nation claimed to be sons of God, and surely an individual might make the same claim with all the sanction of Jewish tradition and without offending the most scrupulous conscience.

But the expedient served the purpose. Jesus responded with even greater frankness than the priest could have anticipated. His words,, "Thou hast said," implied his affirma tive response to the question. But more than this, he immediately added words which could leave no doubt as to the extraordinary claim he made for himself as the revealer of the divine purpose in the world. He said that from that day forth they should see him seated at the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven. In this apocalyptic language he gave them to understand that his work as Messiah and Savior in the world was to begin at once, with its world-wide sweep of power. From that very day and continuously thereafter they would witness his increasing presence in human affairs and human institutions. He was to be Lord of life, the teacher sent from God to bring in the kingdom.

Then followed just what Jesus anticipated; a scene of unparalleled violence. The priest, delighted with the frankness with which Jesus had expressed himself, flew into a violent and calculated passion, rending his clothes and crying out that blasphemy had been spoken and further witness was unnecessary. The hint was taken by the whole company, and our Lord was treated with that excess of indignity which must cause every sensitive mind to wish to draw a curtain over that hour, when human passion reached its lowest point in the violence done to the sacred person of the Savior.

The Voices

By Lawrence W. Neff.

Faint with weariness and pain,
Hope illusive, severed tie,
Little seeming left to gain;
Says the scorner, "Hate and die."

But a world of wealth to give,—
Cheer to souls in deeper need;
Duty whispers, "Love and live."

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

Topic for Nov. 27.—My Favorite Missionary Hero or Heroine, and Why? Heb. 11:32-40.

I have several favorite missionary heroes and heroines. Of all missionaries—men and women to whom God has entrusted his message for the lost—Jesus Christ is chief. He is the great example for all who come after him. But, I take it in this lesson, we are to study some of His disciples who have become missionaries, rather than the Master Himself.

While there are some who are better known, there are none who more truly exemplify the spirit of faith and trust, love and sacrifice, consecration and service, than Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart, who accompanied her husband as a missionary to Tibet. The perfect consecration of her life to service is well exemplified by the kind of field she chose. Tibet was a closed door to the gospel. The land for the most part was fertile, watered by numerous rivers and adorned with mountains. The people are of a rugged type, good sized, ignorant, very religious and superstitious. In the outer portions of Tibet they are engaged in agricultural pursuits and have more or less commerce with the Chinese and other neighboring nations; while the inhabitants of the inner portions of which Lhasa is the capital, are nomads dwelling in tents and subsisting in part off their herds and in part by preying on commercial caravans, chance travelers, and upon one another. They have an inveterate hatred for all white people, whom they genuinely fear and refer to as "foreign devils," and therefore all the passes over the Hymalayan range are carefully guarded. This was not an inviting task—from a sellish point of view.

But their faith and trust in God were perfect. They left America to become pioneer missionaries in that forbidden land, "without any human guarantee of support" for no missionary society had sent them out. confidently believing that "these things would be added" should they "seek first the kingdom of God." She says, "We were filled with joy at the prospect of sowing precious seed on new ground."

They sowed "the precious seed," but at frightful cost. In due time they arrived on the border between China and Tibet. For three years they labored at Tankar, in outer Tibet, with relatively little difficulty. Then they made up a caravan and, taking their infant son, Charles Carson, started for inner Tibet, of which Lhasa was the capital. Slowly they made their way on horseback, fording rivers, climbing mountains, dwelling in tents, sometimes alone, sometimes adjacent to the dwelling places of natives. One day Charles Carson, who had been the life and hope of these two brave missionaries, fell ill, was better the next day, but died the next. Being hundreds of miles from the outside world, and being surrounded by hostile, barbarous tribes and ferocious wild beasts, they of necessity found a burial place there. The mother with tender hands and heavy heart prepared a little medicine box for a casket. Carefully she laid the treasure of her life on his side with folded arms into the box. The next day he was given Christian burial and a great bolder, which was rolled over the grave to protect the body from the prey of wild beasts, is the tombstone of that lonely grave. They journeyed sadly on, but after a few weeks were forced to turn back, and ere they had journeyed far their guides ran off and left them. Soon after, her husband left her with the baggage while he went to secure aid of some natives, but he never returned. Probably he was murdered by the natives. Lost and alone, this sad hearted pilgrim, literally thousands of miles from civilization, surrounded by wild beasts, flowing rivers and hostile people, must shift for herself. She lived to reach civilization and tell her story. Moreover, after regaining her health, she returned to give further of her life to evangelize Tibet.

How in spirit she was like him whose message she bore. Her life she gave for those who despised her, yea, even when they turned upon her and sought her life she ceased not to pray for them and watch for opportunities to serve them. This was too much, you say? Is it not less than our Lord has done for you and me? Such unselfish love has brought the world all its happiness. Jesus prayed the Father to forgive his murderers, and Dr. Rijnhart replied, when asked if it were not a cross to go back to Tibet after suffering so much in that land, "It would be a cross not to return." Oh, God! give us in the home land some such faith, fortitude, and consecration.

Honored Woman Passes Away

Aged Daughter of Walter Scott Dies at Pittsburg

Mrs. Emily Scott Church, whose name is known wherever there are Disciples of Christ, died last week at the home of her son, Col. Samuel Harden Church, in Pittsburgh, Pa. She was 85 years old. Mrs. Church was a daughter of Walter Scott, one of the formative and organizing spirits of the Disciples' movement in its early days, a thinker and preacher whose contribution to the movement is second only to that of the Campbells. Walter Scott was educated at the University of Edinburgh and came to Pittsburgh in 1822, where he engaged in teaching until converted to the Christian union movement inaugurated by Thomas Campbell. It was while Walter Scott lived in Pittsburgh that Mrs. Church was born.

When she was seven years old the family moved from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati and settled at Carthage, a suburb of that city, where her father, Walter Scott, published for many years the "Evangelist," a weekly paper in which he expounded the principles of the Christian Church. During this time she received a very thorough classical education at Fall's School, in Lexington, Ky.

In 1844, when she was nineteen years old, the family returned to Pittsburgh, where her father continued his work as an editor and Evangelical preacher.

On January 1, 1849, she was married to William Church, whose father, Samuel Church, was one of the pioneer iron manufacturers and leading merchants of Pittsburgh, besides being noted as a forceful preacher.

The young couple continued to live in Pittsburgh until they imbibed a desire to establish a home in the West, and this led them in the summer of 1857 to take their little family of three children to Caldwell County, Missouri, where they attempted to found a home on the unbroken prairie. It was an experiment marked by great hardships, suffering and danger, and in the end it was unsuccessful. Missouri, at the place where they resided, was very sparcely settled, and every necessity of life was in the crudest form. On arriving at their new home in the wilderness, the first thing they did was to build, with the help of some neighbors, a log cabin from timber hewn on the premises. This dwelling consisted of but one room, as was the custom of the country, and in this simple habitation another child, Samuel Harden Church, was born, January 24, 1858.

There was no money in that part of the country, and what few necessaries could be obtained were purchased on the basis of exchange for other commodities. The prairie home had no fences and only a meagre outfit of live stock, and the ground itself seemed to yield its products reluctantly. All the food that could be regularly obtained was bacon, a few potatoes, and corn bread made from grating the corn direct from the ear. On rare occasions a sack of flour and a few luxuries, such as tea, coffee, and sugar, were brought from a town fifty miles distant, but these were very irregularly enjoyed.

Mr. Church, the husband, attempted to improve the quality of their civilization by establishing a sawmill on Maribone Creek, and this effort was looked upon with great favor by the neighborhood, as sawed lumber was, at that time, unknown on the prairie, and none of the houses in the wilderness could boast the luxury of a floor. But after a few days of trial the engine broke down, and there was no skilled labor available to keep it going except in a very spasmodic way, and finally the spring floods overwhelmed the little lumber mill and carried engine and mill away in the rushing waters.

Just at this time the slavery dispute had assumed a condition of great bitterness in Missouri, and evil men known as Bushwhackers took advantage of the times to —Note carefully the advertisement (on page 2) of new book now in the press of the New Christian Century Co.

Church Life

—The need of a Life of Jesus that would be practically useful for Sunday-school classes, has been felt for a long time by Sunday-school workers.

—Dr. Scott's work has been prepared to meet this particular need.

—The publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons will announce yet another text for young people's and adult classes next week.

—It is the plan of the publishers of the Bethany series to supply the entire school, not simply that part covered by the International committee's authorized graded lessons.

—The inquiries for prospectus and order blanks of the Bethany Lessons, are coming in fast now. It will be well for schools to order early in December and so avoid the rush in express and mail business at the Christmas end of the month.

Special Sunday morning services were held at the various churches in Kansas City, Mo. by the members of the Sunday-school party on their recent tour.

The Sunday-school at Canton, Ohio, will conduct an institute the first week in January. Some of the best known Sunday-school workers in this country will act as instructors.

There is good attendance at the meetings being held by Allan Wilson at First Church, Lincoln, Ill. Special music is a feature of the services.

Stephen J. Corey, secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society, was the principal speaker at the twentieth annual meeting of the Missionary Social Union of Springfield, Ill., held Nov. 10.

J. Walter Reynolds, pastor at Lyons, Kans., reports that ninety-one dollars has been raised for state missions, and that the full amount of their apportionment, $100 is assured.

The third annual covenant service of Hillside Church, Indianapolis, Ind., was held Nov. 6. This marked the beginning of the fourth years' work of the pastor, Chas. M. Fillmore.

Audiences exceeding the capacity of the church have been in attendance at the meetings held at Gifford, Ill., by Andrew Scott, and a goodly number of additions have been made.

The Roosevelt Heights Church, Tacoma, Wash., pledged twice the sum of its apportionment for home missions. This is manifestly a good example for other churches to follow.

W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, began a meeting at Hiram, Ohio, on November 6. The music will be furnished by a chorus choir of 100 students of Hiram College.

C. J. Chapman, formerly pastor of the First Church, Cherokee, Okla., after an absence of two years, has been called to the pastorate a second time, and began his work there on November 6 with splendid prospects.

Special Rally services were held for a week recently at Mt. Pleasant, Ia. Among the speakers were C. V. Allison, pastor at Albia, Ia. and R. W. Lilly, of the First Church Keokuk, Ia.

Wm. Ross Lloyd of Lexington, Ky., has just concluded a meeting at California, Ky. with E. E. Ball, the pastor there. It is felt that much good has been accomplished in these services.

Richard Martin has just closed a successful meeting at Sweetwater Tex., there being fifty-two additions. Mr. Martin is assisted by his son Elbert Martin as soloist, and they are now at Gainesville Tex. where Ernest L. Mobley is pastor.

A meeting was begun Nov. 6 at Central Church, Dallas, Tex., by the pastor. Mr. Shelburne conducted a meeting last year at his church and on account of its success he was requested by the board to lead another meeting this year.

J. F. Findley has returned from an extended trip abroad and will take charge of the work at Central Church, Pueblo, Colo., during the absence of the pastor J. Elwood Lynn. who was compelled to leave the work for the present on account of ill health.

At the international missionary convention held at Omaha, Neb., recently, a great men's Sunday-school parade included representatives of every trade and profession from many states and nearly 4,000 were in attendance at the model Sunday-school session.

J. M. Van Horn began a meeting at Second Church, Warren, Ohio, November 6. The Sunday-school of Second Church has an enrollment of 376, and that of Central Church where F. N. Calvin is pastor, is about as large.

A. F. Stahl, pastor of First Church, Urichsville, Ohio, is delivering a series of sermons on the Lord's Prayer. The Sunday-school at this church has reached an enrollment of 433, in a contest with the school at Alliance, Ohio.

W. J. Lhamon, of Des Moines, Iowa, is assisting J. H. Craig, pastor of Ninth Street Church, Logansport, Ind., in a series of meetings. Mr. Lhamon is delivering a series of eight lectures on the "Inductive Study of the Character of Christ."

A meeting was held recently at First Church, Vincennes, Ind., its purpose being to form an inter-church brotherhood. Allan B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, Ind., was the speaker of the evening and gave an interesting talk on the Brotherhood movement.

During the election campaign, Charles Reign Scoville addressed a mass meeting of men at Oklahoma City, Okla., in reply to an address by Mayor Rose of Milwaukee, Wis., advocating high license and local option.

C. L. Organ and Charles M. Howe, are in a great meeting with B. B. Tyler at South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo. There have been fifty confessions and seventy added to the membership. The Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition, having an attendance of 474 on a recent Sunday.

The American Peace society has issued an appeal to the leaders of all religious denominations to observe the third Sunday in December as Peace Sunday and on that date to urge by prayer, song and sermon, "the abolition of war and the substitution of imperative, universal arbitration."

The churches of Jasper County, Mo., held a meeting recently at First Church, Joplin, Mo., missionary work was discussed, and one session was devoted to the Sunday-school. D. W. Moore, A. W. Kokendoffer, J. H. Bryan, D. Y. Dona'dson, and J. B. Hunley were among the speakers.

A successful meeting has just closed at Bismarck, Ill. There were a number of additions, and an increased interest in the affairs of the church. The congregation has raised about four times the usual amount of money, and much of the old indebtedness has been canceled.

A rally of the churches of Vermillion County was held at First Church, Danville, Ill., Oct. 31. Nearly all the pastors of the county were present and the addresses were given by J. Fred Jones and Andrew Scott. Much interest was awakened in the cause of state missions and evangelism.

H. F. Reed, after a year's work at First Church, Norman, Okla., has received a unanimous call from his congregation to remain there indefinitely. Plans are being made for a rally and covenant service and an evangelistic meeting will begin in January. All the departments of the church are progressing encouragingly.

The church at Helena, Okla., is now without a pastor, C. J. Chapman, who has supplied the pulpit for the past three months, having accepted his former charge at Cherokee, Okla. The church and Sunday-school are both in excellent condition, the latter having recently undertaken the support of two native missionaries on the foreign field.

A temporary chapel has been erected at Green Bay, Wis., and services were held there on Nov. 6. Frank L. Van Voorhis, editor of The Wisconsin Christian Monthly, has accepted the pastorate. The chapel is located in a part of town where there have heretofore been no churches, and while be ginning in a small way, it is felt that a need will be supplied in this community and that the membership will soon grow.

Work has begun on the new church at Fulton, Mo., which will be erected at a cost of $45,000, and with the Sunday-school rooms will have a seating capacity of 1200. At one time the congregation here was badly divided but through the perseverance of F. W. Allen now of Columbia, Mo., the church was put on a sound footing and now under the leadership of Truman E. Winter, progressive work is being done.

W. H. Bagby, who has accepted the pastorate at West Side Church, San Francisco, Cal., delivered his farewell sermon at Missoula, Mont., to an audience that crowded the capacity of the church and including many representatives of the other churches of the town. While Missoula is an isolated field, Mr. Bagby has done a great work there during the five years of his pastorate, and the press of the city devoted several columns to an appreciation of his service there.

Services were held in the assembly room of the new Third Church at Indianapolis, Ind., which is in process of erection. This room which is the only one completed so far, will be used eventually as a Sunday-school room, and with the adjoining rooms will have a seating capacity which is goal for enrolment in the Sunday-school. When the church is completed many institutional features will be carried out by the pastor, Harry G. Hill, among them a boy's club and a day kindergarten.

Active construction work has begun on the new plant of Texas Christian University, at Fort Worth, Texas. Three buildings are to be begun at once, and several more are contemplated at an early date, one of which will probably be a Bible school building, a considerable sum having already been raised. The office of dean has been created, and W. B. Parks elected to fill this position. Several additions have been made to the faculty, and work in all the departments is making encouraging progress.

On Oct. 24, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Hocker celebrated the sixty-sixth anniversary of their marriage with a reception at Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky. which was attended by many friends of this venerable couple. Hr. Hocker is now eighty-six years old and his wife is four years his junior. Hamilton College, which was formerly called Hocker College was founded by them many years ago. Mr. and Mrs. Hocker have always had a deep interest in educational and philanthropic affairs and they have given at least $100,000 to worthy causes in the South.

H. O. Breeden is in a great meeting at Modesto, Calif., with J. J. White, who ministers there. The readiness of the congregation for a time of spiritual refreshing was shown by the fact that $800 was raised to pay expenses before the beginning of the meeting. The music is in charge of the Linnts. The meeting was begun in the church but is was necessary to erect a Tabernacle with a capacity of 1,300 to accomodate the large audiences who are attracted by the forceful, convincing preaching.

George T. Meeker is visiting many California churches in the interest of missions.

For more than tweny years Central Church, Peoria, Ill., maintained a mission. About a year ago, this became an independent congregation, being organized as the Howett Street Church with a membership of 120. Wiliam Price, who had preached for the mission for three years while completing his college course, was made its regular pastor on his graduation. At the first annual meeting held recently, nearly every member was in attendance and the reports show a most successful year's work. The membership has increased to 152, and of this number all but half a dozen have contributed a pledged sum each Sunday, and this in a congregation composed of weekly wage earners. The Sunday-school has an average atendance of 200, and as the full capacity of the equipment is now being used, the officers of the church are considering the advisability of holding an afternoon session. Financially the church shows splendid gain, over two hundred dollars having been sent to the various mission boards and a building fund started.

commit robbery and murder, carrying their hatred of the anti-slavery principles which were held by northern people like the Church family to such an extent that persons were sometimes hanged for their opinions at their own roadsides. This violence was the hot breath fortelling the approach of the Civil War, and, when taken with all the other hardships of the situation, it discouraged many families formerly accumstomed to the comforts and refinements of a better life from enduring any longer the miseries of the wilderness. Accordingly, in the spring of 1859 the Church family entered their wagon, and, as their was no possibility of making a sale of their effects, they left everything, including the log house, furniture, live stock, and land behind them, and set out across the country for Lexington, Mo., where tney took the boat, only too glad, as Mrs. Church has often said, to get out of the country without leaving the bones of any member of the family behind. The trip home was made down the Missouri River to St. Louis, and up the Ohio to Pittsburgh, and when the mother and father with four children stepped on the wharf at Pittsburgh they declared that they were returning to an earthly paradise.

Soon after their return to Pittsburgh, the fifth and last child, Sarah Church, was born. The father, William Church, resumed his commercial life and after a while became superintendent of the Pittsburgh and Oakland Railway Company. He died on March 11, 1863. Mrs. Church was left, at his death, with the care of five small children, whom she educated in the best way she could until they were old enough to take care of themselves and her. Of her five children, two, Walter Scott Church and Emily Church, are dead, and three survive, viz: Samuel Harden Church and Mrs. Mary Church Reinhart, of Pittsburgh, and Mrs. Sarah Church Benham, of Columbus, Ohio.

Possessed of an unusual mental equipment, her intellectual faculties never seemed until quite recently, to yield to the impairment of age, and until two years ago she was studying the French language with all the enthusiasm of a college student, committing the Psalms to memory, and making a critical study of Dean Stanley's "History of the Jewish Church," in three volumes. She always displayed the keenest interest in the politics of the world, and was familiar with the very latest development or opinion in every question of public concern.

Eureka College Letter

Preparations for Education Day, January 15, 1911, have commenced. Last year 103 churches in Illinois took an offering for Eureka College. We are confident of at least 200 this year. Education Day has been observed in Illinois since 1904. There has been a steady increase in the amount contributed and the number of churches contributing since the beginning. Eureka College probably makes as thorough preparation for the observance of Education Day in Illinois as any missionary society amonk us. In Illinois we feel that the time must come when Christian education will be regarded as a part of the regular church work. And why should it not be? If it is a good thing to give money to preach the gospel in foreign lands, it is certainly a good thing to give money to the school to help train the missionary. If it is a good thing to give money to preach the gospel in America, it is certainly a good thing to give money to the school that trains the preacher for his work. If it is a good thing to give money through the Church Extension Society to help build churches, it is a good thing to give money to help train the preacher to occupy the church after it is built. If it is a good thing to have Christian institutions, it is certainly a good thing to give young men and women a Christian education that they may protect and bring to perfection such institutions.

A Missionary Overcoat

Who wants a first class fur overcoat? A reader of The Christian Century writes us that he has one for sale at $40, virtually new, worn only a few times last winter, cost $75. It was given to our correspondent by the congregation to which he ministered in the north country. He now proposes to give the proceeds of the sale to our missionary societies. It is made of selected coon-skins of the best quality, quilted silk lining, and a large fur collar which covers the neck and ears. It is a perfect fit for a tall man and can be worn as well by one of shorter build. After examination the coat may be returned if not satisfactory. Address O. Case, The Christian Century.

Dedication at Dublin, Ga.

The dedication of the church at Dublin, Ga., I consider to be one of the history making events among the Christian churches in our state, as it shows what can be done by a handful of people who are willing to work.

About three years ago the Dublin brethern conceived the idea of erecting a house of worship that would be creditable, not only to the enterprising city of Dublin but also creditable to the enterprise of our restoration movement in that city.

With less than one hundred workers, plans were formulated and perfected that resulted in the erection of a church property that is now valued at $15,000.

During the three years of construction $9,000 was raised by this faithful band of workers. This was accomplished by planning, praying and paying, the three essential elements in success. Under the wise council of M. A. Cassaboom, the present minister, I. N. McCash, secretary of the American Missionary Society, was secured to raise what he could of the remaining $4,000 debt and to dedicate the building.

On the day of dedication, Oct. 30, after the usual preliminaries, Mr. McCash addressed the audience for twenty minutes upon the value and benefits of the church in their city and lue and then thirty-five minutes were used in raising funds and $3.350,in cash and good pledges, was secured in that thirty-five minutes.

BAKING POWDER

No Alum—No Phosphates

Be on your guard. Alum Powders may be known by their price—10 or 25c. a lb., or one cent an ounce.

After dinner the remaining $650.00 was raised before the dedicatory service began. A number of visiting members of other churches in Dublin were liberal in their donations to this fund.

The wise planning and undaunted courage of the minister, M. A. Cassaboom, should not fail to attract the thought of the brethern who have similar problems before them. The representive ministers of the city were present at the evening service and expressed their delight and congratulations for such heroic efforts and attainment. This places our Dublin's citizens. The outlook is excellent respect and attention of the very best of Dublin's citizens. The out look is excellent for aggressive work.

New York City Mission Notes

A mass-meeting of the Disciples' Missionary Union was held Tuesday, November 1, at the 126th St. Church, Manhattan. Dr. W. Bayard Craig gave an interesting address on "Our Forces, Fields and Opportunities." C. H. Stauffer, State Secretary, spoke on, "Our Jubilee Year in State Missions." Joseph Keevil gave a report of the National Convention. The imperative need of a suitable building for the Mission Church at Ridgewood Heights was presented to the meeting, and over $900 was raised for this purpose. This rapid growing suburban section of Brooklyn is an inviting field for this mission work. Robert Wittchen has done a faithful work at this point, even though laboring under the serious hindrance of having no suitable meeting place.

The call of the Pacific Coast has taken from us W. C. Bower, who was doing such a splendid work at Edgewater Mission Church. During October, Roscoe Hill has been supplying at this church very acceptably, but his leaving the city in a few months makes impossible his accepting the work. Newell L. Sims has been secured to take the work and we expect the splendid work begun to be successfully carried forward.

One of the great problems in our city mission work is to provided the needed funds to secure the proper buildings for carrying on the work, the lots alone costing from $1,500 to $5,000, and buildings of the plainest possible construction costing another equal amount. We are forced to consider an expense of from $3,000 to $5,000 before any mission is housed sufficiently, to do an effective work. These funds, to be raised from churches already burdened with their own necessary expenses, makes the task of establishing missions exceedingly difficult. This serious problem merits the consideration of those having large wealth and consecration to the cause of Christ. When we consider the importance of firmly establishing the church in the great centers of population, the task of finding those willing to make it possible, should not be a difficult one. Twenty-five persons, willing to put $100 each year for ten years into the evangelization of New York City, with the amount that could be raised on the field, would make possible the establishment of at least one or two churches each year, and in ten years churches enough could be established to carry forward an aggressive city evangelization work. As a people, we are sufficiently strong to consider a plan large enough to adequately touch the life of this great city with our message. Shall we do it?

We welcome to our circle Irving Chenowith, who has accepted a call to the 169th St. Church. Mr. Chenowith enters upon his duties November 13. The church has a splendid building and a faithful, loyal membership. They are facing the problem of a changing constituency, but there is a great work to be done, and under the leadership of Mr. Chenowith, they will give good account of themselves.

The First Church, on 81st Street, is especially well located and delightfully happy in their work. Their greatest history is yet to be made. Their pastor, W. L. Fisher, is wisely leading them into great and efficient service for the kingdom.

Not in many years has the outlook of the Lenox Ave. Church been so bright as it is just now, under the splendid leadership of W. Bayard Craig.

M. M. Amunson, at Sterling Place, is leading that splendid church into heroic service. They are forgetting their difficult field and are forging ahead with a faith and optimism that is inspiring.

The mission churches are making good progress. The educational classes among the Russians are retaining their usual interest and the Russian brethren are continuing faithful in their work.

Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Annual Offering First Sunday in December

CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS AND AMERICA'S JUBLIEE OF WOMAN'S ORGANIZED WORK FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The year 1910-11 marks a half century of woman's organized work in America for foreign mission. All Woman's Missionary Societies of all churches are asked to observe the year as a special anniversary period, that the missionary offerings this year may be the largest in the history of each Board's work.

The idea originated with the Central Committee on United Mission Study. This committee, representing the leading denominations of the United States, together with the approval of the various Woman's Foreign Missionary Boards, recommended a series of thirty Interdenominational Rallies in some of the principal cities of the East and West, beginning in October, 1910, the last to be a great Missionary Mass Meeting, in New York City in the spring of 1911.

From the first announcement the Christian Woman's Board of Missions hailed the idea as indeed the providence of God.

C. W. B. M. Day will be the special time to first sound out the Jubilee call to the general public and to every Auxiliary and Circle member and also the Children's Missionary Societies. Some Auxiliaries have already planned to organize for personal solicitation the week preceding the Sunday service that every member of the church may be told of the Jubliee offering and a gift in cash or a pledge may be secured from each person. In case of a pledge, it can be paid C. W. B. M. Day or any time during the year.

SOME SUGGESTIONS FOR SPECIAL GIFTS WHICH MAY BE SOLICITED FOR THE C. W. B. M. DAY OFFERING.

A days support for a missionary, $1.65.
Annual members Life gift, $5.00.
Life Membership, $25.
Memorial Life Membership, $25.
Support for orphan, $30.
Support for women at Woman's and Children's Home, Kulpahar, India, $30.
Share in station support, $50.
Native helper's salary, from $25 to $150 a year.
Mountain scholarship, $100.
Life Line, $300.
Passage money to send a new missionary to the fields, $300 to $400.
Living Link, $600.
Living Link Standard, $600.
Gifts for the General Fund, any amount.
Memorial gift, any amount.
Pledges of any amount to be paid within the year or later.
Gifts for the rebuilding of the wrecked chapels in Jamaica; some $300, some $3,000.
Gifts for the completion of the Centennial for the Industrial School in Jamaica.
Offerings for the Chinese Hospital in San Francisco and the Japanese Home in Los Angeles.
Gifts for the school to be opened in Satillo, Mexico.
Large gifts in terms of hundreds and thousands.
Gifts both small and great.
Gifts for medical and school supplies.
Gifts for evangelistic work in all lands.
Gifts for our mountain schools and negro schools.
Gifts for the Endowment Fund for the Missionary Training School.
Where straight gifts cannot be made, secure annuity offering.

In all solicitations, make a specialty of receiving new members for the local Missionary Societies. If we can reach the aim of 100,000 women, it will be easy to raise $400,000.

Take note that all gifts, both regular monthly offerings for the National Treasury and all special gifts, this year count to the credit of the one general Jubilee offering.

The greatest gift for our women is "What she could.",

A woman's work in Gods way, all she can give, all she can do, all she can pledge, not only for C. W. B. M. Day but every day this year for the Jubilee offering.

MRS. M. E. HARLAN.

A PERSONAL LETTER.

Will you kindly take the time to read a few words about the needs of our mission work among the Chinese in California? This work was started a little over three years ago. When we look back over those three years, and see what has been accomplished, we feel that our work has not been in vain. God has ever been present and has certainly greatly blessed the efforts which have been made to do His work. We now have a splendid night school for the men and boys, which has had an average attendance per night of 40; a Sunday-school with an average attendance of about 25; a church enrollment of 37 men, and a Young Men's Christian Association with an enrollment of 58; and special work being done in the homes with the women and children.

The idea when the mission work was first started was to build a hospital for the Chinese people in San Francisco, as it is the Mecca for the thirty thousand Chinese in California. We have been working and praying these many months hoping that money would be given so that this building could be erected, for you all know that there is nothing that will win the confidence and respect of a heathen people like help and kind treatment. Such as can be given them in a mission hospital when they are sick and in trouble. But while we are waiting many are dying, many others are suffering unnecessarily and many souls are unsaved that might have been saved if we had had a well equipped hospital in which to work. The thought of every man a brother, was much emphasized in our convention in Topeka, but are we treating these aliens in our home land, at our very doors, like brothers? I am sorry to say that we are not. It almost makes me tremble when I think of the great number of Chinese, almost in the very heart of San Francisco, the very great majority of whom are in heathendom as dark as they were in their own native land of China, and I think how very little we have done for them. Do we realize our obligation to them and the great responsibility which is ours? I am sure we do not, for if we did the money would have been given long ago for the hospital building for the Chinese in San Francisco. I am sure if you will just take time enough to think about these people that they have souls just as precious in the sight of God as yours and that Christianity means just as much to them as it does to you, and that it will do just as much for them as it has done for you, you will be ready and willing to help answer the earnest prayers of your Christian Chinese brothers in San Francisco, who are so anxiously waiting and so earnestly praying for your help, so that well equipped buildings may be erected in which a great work may be done for the Master. O, friends, will you not help to answer these earnest prayers? Just think what might have been your condition at this very time, if the gospel had not been given to you, before it was to the Chinese people, and remember that it means just as much to them as it does to you, and helps them just as much as it does you. Let us remember how very fortunate we were in receiving the gospel message first, and let us do all we can to help tell the good news to those who have never heard it. O, may God help us to realize what a great opportunity is ours, and what an obligation is ours in regard to this work among the Chinese on the Pacific coast. O, may we be willing to give of our time, talents, and money, whatever may be ours to give to the work. May our gratitude to God be substantially expressed in our gifts to send the gospel to these people who have not, as yet, received it. MARY EDWARDS.

The Bloomington Bible Chair

Indiana University, at Bloomington, Indiana, enrolls every year from 200 to 300 students from Christian church homes. There has been a need for several years for the proper care of these students. As a result of the efforts of some of the leading brethren and preachers in the state of Indiana, the initial steps to the establishment of a Bible Chair have been taken. On October the 29th, eleven directors incorporated an association for the purpose of establishing and maintaining this work. The directors are Edgar F. Daugherty, President, Vincennes; J. E. Martin, Vice President, Indianapolis; E. L. Day, Secretary, Noblesville; Dr. Rodney D. Smith, Treasurer, Bloomington; Joseph C. Todd, Financial Secretary, Bloomington; R. W. Abberley, Rushville; Ira C. Batman, Bloomington; E. R. Edwards, Kokomo; E. M. C. Hobbs, Bloomington; L. C. Howe, New Castle; J. M. Rudy, Greencastle.

The purpose of the association is to offer courses in the Bible and religion, direct the religious activities and give pastoral care to the students of the Christian church at the State University of Indiana. It is hoped that a man can be secured to open the work in 1911. The association plans to create an endowment of $60,000 for permanent maintenance. There is an immediate need of $5,000 to $10,000 for the purpose of immediate establishment. This opens an opportunity of large results to the consecrated wealth of the state of Indiana. The work has received the approval of the State Board of Indiana and of leading members of the church in the state. The president of the university, Dr. W. L. Bryan, and the trustees of the university are not only cordial, but anxious that the work be established. There could be no more profitable investment of means than in the young life of the future leadership of the church in the state of Indiana. Offerings to this work should be sent to Rodney D. Smith, Treasurer, or Joseph C. Todd, Financial Secretary, Bloomington, Indiana. Any correspondence with reference to the work should be addressed to the Financial Secretary.

Congress Call Corrected

The announcement of the Disciples' Congress in The Christian Century last week was partly incorrect. I recalled the announcement by card, but my card did not reach the office until after the paper had gone to press. The following announcement is final and correct:

The Congress of the Disciples of Christ will convene with the West Side Church, Springfield, Illinois, April 18 to 20, 1911. John R. Golden is the pastor of this church. We believe that the place will be most acceptable to the Brotherhood. The program is being carefully prepared and will be published as soon as possible. Inasmuch as the National Convention goes to Portland, Ore., next year, the central location of the Congress will give an opportunity to many to attend the National gathering next year who cannot go to Portland.

JOSEPH C. TODD.
Secretary-Treasurer.

Bloomington, Indiana.

Why He Changed

It would go hard with many to "give an answer to every man that asketh a reason" why they belong to one denomination rather than another. They would sympathize with a negro who, says Mr. Thomas Kane in the Interior, was pressed to tell why he had left the Methodists and joined the Episcopal Church. "Why did you do it?" was the question. "Well," he replied, "we is moh oddehly; we has moh style." "Yes, but what do you do?" "Well, fo' one thing, we has responsible readin's." "Well, what else?" "Well, we has Roman candles on de alteh, and den we buhn insec' powdeh."

The Illinois Christian Educational Association.

I have been asked several times recently to explain the relationship between the Illinois Christian Educational Association and the Endowment Campaign for Eureka College. This is a good place to say an important word. The association came into existence some thirteen years ago and had for its purpose the interesting of a large group of people in giving small amounts to the support of the college. Its work has been unusually successful in this respect. The association was never in better condition than at present.

A Self Cure For Disease
HUMAN ELECTRICITY

The new Science of Human Electricity proves that electricity is the only power that can cure disease, being the life power and controlling all the functions of the vital organs, muscles and brain. There are self-treatments and methods whereby any individual can increase the electrical production of his own body, and draw an aunbance of electricity and nourishment into the weak or diseased organs or parts; and bring about a positive cure of the various forms of weakness or disease.

Send for the booklet, "Organic Electricity," which explains why indigestion, insomnia, constipation, nervous disorders, heart weakness, liver and kidney troubles, catarrh, rheumatism and the various uric acid diseases, the age conditions, etc., can, with all certainty, be cured by learning to increase the electrical power of the body.

SOCIETY OF UNIVERSAL SCIENCE,
Suite 924, 246 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"In the leading publications of the United States, the work and discoveries of Mr. McConnell are highly commended, and some class his researches in human electricity on a par with that of Marconi in atmospheric electricity."—The Baptist World.

Mrs. S. J. Crawford, of Eureka, has been president of the association from the beginning until the State Convention in Springfield this fall. She has done great service, but failing health made it necessary for her to give up the work. She was made honorary president of the association and will continue her relationship with the work. Mrs. O. W. Stewart was elected president at that time and has entered upon her duties with her characteristic enthusiasm. Mrs. Stewart is a graduate of Eureka College and has had large experience in temperance and equal suffrage work. She brings to the office of president of the I. C. E. A. a wealth of experience and training that will make her a strong leader among our people in Illinois. Miss Luceba E. Miner is the field secretary of the I. C. E. A. She spends all her time in the field securing members for the association and working for new students. She has not been in the field very long, but has had splendid success and will do still greater service. She was president of the Loyal Temperance Legion of Illinois for a number of years, is an able speaker and an untiring worker. She has a large circle of friends and will be a most valuable helper in our educational work.

The Endowment Campaign was inaugurated for a special purpose, the raising of $125,000 for Eureka College. A committee of five was appointed to take charge of this campaign. The work of this committee will end with the raising of the $125,000. My work as field secretary is only temporary. It never was intended to be anything else. The I. C. E. A. and the Campaign Committee are working faithfully to accomplish definite ends this year. A motion was passed in the educational session of the State Convention to appoint a committee of three to bring about certain changes in the constitution of the I. C. E. A., making it even more representative than it has been and uniting in one organization the best elements of both institutions This committee consists of H. H. Peters, F. W. Burnham, and Mrs. O. W. Stewart. No action has been taken by the committee. The report will be rendered at the next state convention. In the meantime we must finish our $125,000 endowment proposition and push the work of the I. C. E. A. more vigorously than ever. H. H. PETERS.

American Mission Notes

The Mission Prayer Circle topic for November 20 is: "The Offering Made Today for American Missions." This is the Bible-school Day for American Missions. Every school throughout the land has been asked to co-operate in this great day, and it is hoped that the most of them are responding with liberal offerings.

"When Joshua was old and stricken in years, after many battles and victories in the land of Canaan, the Lord appeared to him and said: 'There remaineth yet much land to be possessed.' This is the greatest reason for a most generous offering, something truly great, for there remains in America much land to be possessed by Christ and Christian union."

The Bible-school work among the foreigners in connection with the mission at New Salem gives us more encouragement than anything else we have tried to do among this class of people. No less than fifty-five foreign children are present each Sunday afternoon in the school. During the month, Brother Keusseff reached two thousand and twenty people, eighty-five Croatians, eighty-nine Servians, one thousand three hundred eighty-four Bulgarians, three hundred fifty-nine Russians and two hundred thirteen Macedonians. His work consists of Bible readings, prayer-meetings, and house-to-house visitations.

We had a fine beginning Lord's Day at Green Bay, Wis. Our opening went beyond our expectations. Bible-school and regular services both give good promise. Our dedication will be December 5. We hope to dedicate free of debt. This is a difficult but great and important field. I think it will be heard from. The new Bible-school will take an offering for home missions on the appointed day. We are urging all our schools to do so.—F. L. Van Voorhis, Green Bay, Wis.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Mr. Rains is now in India. He reached Colombo on the 12th of October. In Australia he was the guest of the Federal Conference. He spoke two or three times every day. His month in Australia was one of the busiest of his life. He hopes to be in Manila by Christmas.

The watchword for the present missionary year is a half million dollars for Foreign Missions and twenty-five new missionaries. The ideal is every church and every member of the church a contributor.

Secretary Allen, O. J. Grainger of India, and M. B. Madden of Japan, are in a great campaign in Iowa and Missouri. They are visiting churches and holding rallies. All the churches in the neighborhood are invited to attend. At night a stereopticon is used and moving pictures and still pictures are shown.

The kindergarten building in Akita, Japan, is to be completed by the first of December. Heretofore the children have been meeting in the missionaries' kitchen. Now they will have a beautiful building of their own. This will add greatly to the efficiency of the institution.

A good friend of the society has promised $7,000 for a hospital in the Philippines. This building will be erected after Dr. Pickett's return from furlough.

D. C. McCallum and wife are expected in Cincinnati. the Philippines any day. They go from Australia to Manila. They are greatly needed at Vigan.

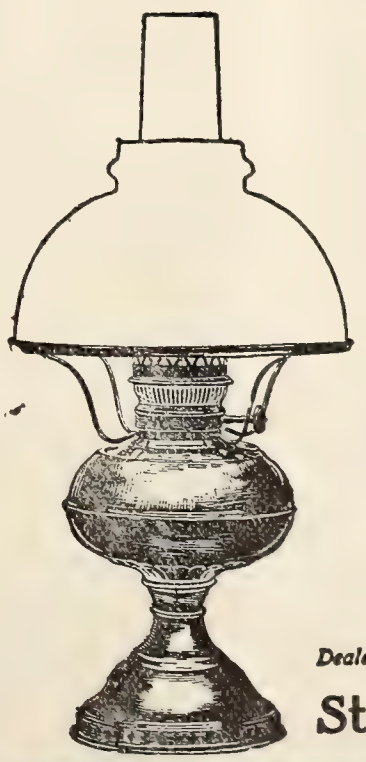
The one volume report of the Edinburgh Conference is off the press. This is a popular account of the conference. It sells for $1.00.

"Where the Book Speaks," by A. McLean, sells well. It is now in the third edition. This book is sold all over the English-speaking world.

Mission study classes should be organized in thousands of the churches. Young people cannot spend an evening more profitably than in the study of "Breaking Down Chinese Walls" or "Revenge." Either book can be mastered in eight evenings. Either book will open up a new world of thought and life to the members of the class.

Friends of the society should know that the general fund is the one that needs to be built up constantly. Many people wish to give something for some special purpose. That is very well, but every special work becomes a charge on the general fund. Out of the general fund all of the regular expenses must be paid.

The society is preparing for its March Offering campaign. This will be begun and carried on in earnest after the holidays.



The Australian churches propose to co operate more closely than heretofore with the society. This will be helpful to both parties. The Australian churches are doing remarkably well. They are supporting missionaries in Japan, India, China, Africa and New Hebrides.

Recently the great native church building at Mengo, Uganda, East Africa, was struck by lightning and destroyed. The building seated 4,000 people. Many of the timbers for its construction were carried fifty miles by the natives. Twenty-five years ago Uganda was entirely heathen.

A good friend in Missouri has just given the society $5,600 on the Annuity Plan.

STEPHEN J. COREY, Secretary.

The Famous Rayo

Does Not Strain the Eyes

Don't use a small, concentrated light over one shoulder. It puts an unequal strain on your eyes. Use a diffused, soft, mellow light that cannot flicker, that equalizes the work of the eyes, such as the Rayo Lamp gives, and avoid eye strain.

The Rayo is designed to give the best light, and it does.

It has a strong, durable shade-holder that is held firm and true. A new burner gives added strength. Made of solid brass and finished in nickel. Easy to keep polished. The Rayo is low priced, but no other lamp gives a better light at any price.

THE LIFE OF JESUS
In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT

This Book Is Now In Press

It comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

Following is Professor Wakefield's Introduction to Dr. Scott's volume:

"Dr. Loa E. Scott has had long experience in school life, in college and university. She has been both student and teacher. She felt early and deeply that there was serious lack in the teaching of the Sunday-school. Poor provision was made for minds that were mature and purposeful; there was lack of such continuity as leads to definite and satisfactory results.

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"She is plainly doing a work that is called for in many and many a community. And if her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world." E. B. WAKEFIELD.

THE MORAL LEADERS OF ISRAEL
In Fifty-two Lessons

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Appearing Weekly in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.

For many years Dr. Willett's department treating of the International Uniform lessons has been one of the leading features of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. For 1911 there will be two important changes in this department.

1. Instead of following the Uniform lessons which are rapidly being abandoned by the best schools in favor of the Graded series, Dr. Willett will coöperate with the publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons in producing a course for young people's and adult classes, on constructive lines, in the field of Old Testament Prophecy. There is intense human interest today in those ancient prophets—the moral leaders of Israel.

The international Uniform lessons for next year deal with the same studies. While Dr. Willett's arrangement of the material will differ from that of the Uniform lessons, there will be many points at which the two series will be tangent to each other. Both the similarity and difference between the two courses will give added interest to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY course in schools where the Uniform lessons are used in whole or in part.

2. The other change in Dr. Willett's department is that while in the past the lessons have been prepared mainly as an aid to teachers, in the coming year they will be prepared for both pupils and teacher. Instead of the plain narrative form there will be variety of treatment, the use of questions and other pedagogical devices for giving point to each lesson. Dr. Willett will bring into use that well-known teaching gift which makes his university class room so constantly popular.

The publishers of The Christian Century propose to supply classes of six or more with weekly copies of the paper at $1 per year for each copy, or 30 cents per quarter. This, when one thinks of it, is an extraordinary offer. The class members will receive in addition to their Sunday-school lesson all the rich things provided every week in The Christian Century. The papers distributed to the class on Sunday will contain the lesson for the following Sunday.

Send your order through the regular Sunday-school Treasurer if you wish to pay quarterly; or deal directly with the Publishers, enclosing remittance at the rate of $1.00 per year for each copy ordered. Be sure and give name of teacher or class member to whom papers shall be sent for distribution.

In making plans for the New Year let all pastors and teachers and members of Bible classes, who read this announcement, bring it to the attention of their classes and arrange at once to be supplied with THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY and THE LIFE OF JESUS, for the first Sunday in January.

The Forward Movement Among Disciples

WHAT GIVES THE PRESENT TIME ITS SIGNIFICANCE IN THE HISTORY OF THE DISCIPLES WILL SOME DAY BE SEEN TO BE THE FACT THAT JUST NOW THE BROTHERHOOD BECAME CONSCIOUS OF A GREAT FORWARD MOVEMENT WITHIN ITS BORDERS.

We prefer to say "forward" rather than "progressive," because the latter word has come to stand for a theological movement; and the important thing now happening among the Disciples is not simply a theological change but a practical, purposeful, moral effort of Disciples of all schools to go forward in the practice of Christian union.

This is not to say that the spirit of progressive thinking has had no part in the launching and directing of the forward movement. Without the presence of that spirit in the brotherhood there would be no progress.

But the forward movement, once started, draws to itself men of varying points of view. The dividing lines tend to fade out and conservative and progressive stand together as brothers with one common task before them.

This new-felt unity within the brotherhood is one of the obvious signs of a forward movement. It banishes suspicion from the heart of the conservative and cynicism from the heart of the progressive.

And where, if not among the Disciples of Christ, should one expect to find the yoking together of men who hold widely diverse views on matters of history and science and criticism?

What expectancy is there that our proposals for the uniting of the sects of Christendom will so much as gain their ear if we have not solved the problem of unity among ourselves?

The Disciples are God's experiment in Christian union. We have abandoned all artificial bonds, like creeds and ecclesiastical authority, and committed ourselves to the single principle of loyalty to Christ. Is this principle sufficient? Will it hold us together in the face of new differences of opinion which are continually arising and bound to arise?

If it will not, our plea is vain and our history is vain.

But there are decisive signs that it will. The bitterness, the bigotry, the vituperation of the controversy is passing. Save from one quarter only, it is not any more heard among us. And that voice has lost its influence either to scare or to lead the Disciples.

That was an illuminating and pathetic episode when the personal friend of the editor of the Christian Standard recently wrote him a letter openly abjuring the paper and rebuking the editor for the deterioration of his ideals since he came into editorial responsibility.

But even more significant was the utterance of Rev. Charles S. Medbury in last week's issue of the Christian Standard when he administered a rebuke as plain and blunt as his kindly heart could formulate. He says:

"The whole theory upon which the Standard office is working just now is to me a thing of distressing sadness—the sadness of a friend. If a man chances to favor some propositions in the brotherhood's life that the Christian Standard does not approve, he is too frequently treated as though he were a plotter, in an underhanded way, against vital interests of our Zion. By insinuation, at least, men who differ as to methods are held up as though of questionable loyalty to the great fundamentals most sacredly cherished among us. It is against this sad state of things I plead with all my heart."

This, taken in connection with hundreds of similar expressions from brethren who have sought in every way to defend the Standard, means that that paper in its present spirit has been left behind by the real leaders and counsellors. It will continue to vituperate, but the brotherhood will go forward unheeding.

All this means that unity is being deepened among ourselves, and the strain of the transition period of the past dozen years is passing.

It was at the Topeka convention that the forward movement became conscious to the brotherhood as a whole.

The creation of the Council on Christian Union is an event of utmost significance. There have been many forward movements among Disciples at various times: a forward movement in evangelism, a forward movement in church extension, in missions, in Sunday school work.

But this Council on Christian Union is a forward movement in the main matter of our existence as a people.

For a number of years there has been gathering a sentiment among the Disciples working toward the extricating of the plea for unity from the trammels of dogma with which it has been interwoven.

The sentiment has already gathered such body and vitality as to impel a decided advance of the whole brotherhood in the genuine practice of unity

Forced into a separate existence at the beginning and blessed of God with marvelous growth of churches and membership, the Disciples have been constantly subjected to the temptation to forget the testimony for unity which we were originally commissioned to bear.

The serious aspect of this phenomenal success, however, was the steady crystallizing of an originally tentative set of ideas into a hard and fast creed, unwritten, to be sure, but none the less definite and exclusive.

The pristine plea for the immediate practice of unity despite diversity of creed, took on the form of an argument for a particular basis of unity.

The natural effect—so natural as to be well nigh excusable had not our commission been so sacred and fateful—the natural effect of this denominational success was to eclipse the great ideal which first called the Disciples into being.

The plaintive note dropped out of our preaching. The argumentative note took its place. We still talked about our "plea" for union, but the wooing tenderness with which Thomas Campbell had given it its initial and classic statement gave place to a harsh legalism and an unimaginative literalism entirely foreign to the great founder's temper.

The paradox of this the Disciples are now beginning to see. It is not strange that we should be seeing it in this year following our Centennial of the publication of the Declaration and Address.

For, like all true forward movements, this of the Disciples is also a return to origins—a restoration. It goes back, under the guidance of Christ, to the great utterance of Thomas Campbell, the catholic-minded inspirer of our hundred years of history.

The spirit of the Topeka convention in dealing with the theme of Christian unity was akin to the spirit of Thomas Campbell. Of no convention in the past sixty years could this be so truly said.

As this movement goes forward it grows daily more clear that the first consequence of it will be the shaking off by the Disciples themselves of any lingering or acquired sectarian practices.

They will no longer talk of "converting" Methodists, Presbyterians and other Christians. They will regard them as already Christians, members of Christ's church, and will take the glad consequences of this admission by practicing the freest fellowship with them.

They will make good their ideal not to be a denomination, by refusing to assert the rights arrogated to themselves by denominations.

This common-denominatorship of the Disciples will commend itself to the Christian world and as we may be given grace to dwell in unity among ourselves our principles will be imitated by others.

The Disciples wish to issue no ultimatum to Christendom. They wish to acknowledge their religious neighbors as Christians indeed, members of the Church of Christ, sundered without good reason into sects.

And they, the Disciples, plead with them to sit down together at Christ's feet and learn how they may be one again.

This is the heart and the motive of the forward movement among the Disciples of Christ.

Social Survey

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

Was It a Democratic Victory?

On the face of the returns it was. And the Democrats may look with some confidence to the election of a president in 1912 unless all the signs fail. Both elections of Cleveland were presaged by the return of a Democratic House two years before. But even the most sanguine partizan would do well to ask himself whether such a landslide can be reckoned as a wholesale conversion to those fundamental principles which marks the deep lines of distinction between Republicanism and Democracy. Gifford Pinchot declares there is less difference between progressives in the two parties than there is between the progressive and stand-pat elements in either of the parties. It is a notable fact that with but a single exception, that of Senator Beveridge, the Insurgents were victorious where they had won the Republican nominations in Republican territory. What La Follette contended for in Wisconsin was as radical as anything Bryan ever contended for and his Democratic opposition was quite as progressive as he, yet La Follette suffered no losses. In Kansas, practically everything was won by the Insurgents in the primaries and with old-time majorities in the elections, excepting Gov. Stubbs, who received the united oppositon of stand-patism in both parties in a desperate attempt to make an example of him. In Tennessee the progressive and anti-machine Democrats entered into a fusion with independent Republicans and triumphed by electing a Republican governor. On the other hand, every one of the fifteen Democratic governors elected, beginning with Maine, ran on progressive or Bryan platforms, while with the exception of Pennsylvania and Rhode Island every Republican governor elected ran on an insurgent platform. The Insurgents claim that every one of their Republican members of Congress were returned while the Stand-pat members were the victims of the terrible slaughter that gives the Democrats an overwhelming majority in the next House. Beveridge's defeat in Indiana was not because of his insurgency, because his opponent was on an even more progressive platform and has always been a Bryan Democrat. If it was a Democratic victory, it is because Democracy, long out of power, was progressive, while Republicanism, so long in power, was more Stand-pat that Insurgent.

How Will They Use Their Opportunity?

Will the Democratic majority in the House be patriotic or partizan? Will they plot to carry the next election by old-time political and partizan strategy, or will they recognize the signs of the times and offer such statesmanlike legislation to the Insurgent Republicans that the really broad-minded men among them will bring a Senate majority and thus enact progressive legislation. If the Democrats of the House are more statesmen than partizans they will make terms with the Insurgent balance of power in the Senate and repeal the robber schedules in the tariff, beginning with wool. They will pass a railroad bill that will compel men like Cummins, Bristow and La Follette to give it the heartiest support, and Mr. Taft will be compelled to either sign and align himself with progressive policies or veto and follow the pathway that Cleveland trod, by splitting his party and turning his followers over to a routing that will give progressive Democracy an overwhelming majority in the next election. With the exception of Fitzgerald of New York, the "Cannon Democrats" were left at home but there are Cleveland Democrats yet, i. e., conservative men who should have left the party when Bryanism triumphed and who have more sympathy today with stand-pat Republicans than with Bryan Democrats. In states like Ohio, New Jersey and New York they are plotting to obtain the senatorships and keep the Senate safely Stand-pat. Men like Sheehan in New York and McLean in Ohio have no sympathy with progressive legislation. They are the defenders of the same partizan manipulation, autocratic management of politics and financial privilege that Cannon and Aldrich are. The same element in the House, composed of Bourbon Democrats from the South and old-time Cleveland Democrats from the East, are planning to defeat Champ Clark for Speaker and prevent the radical change in rules that the progressive of both parties and the whole country with them demands. It is not beyond a possibility that lines may be drawn in the House between Progressive and Stand-pat Democrats and the alignment on legislation become less a matter of party than of progressive versus conservative

Types of "Progressives"

While the lines are broadly drawn between progressives and conservatives, there are types of both through which the one converges over into the other. There is the Nick Longworth type of both or neither, as one may prefer to put it. He votes with Cannon until the signs of the times loom unmistakably and then aligns himself with the progressives, but spurns the name of Insurgent. There is the Hadley type, who is frankly progressive in his own attitude, but who leans backwards until he feels safe in party regularity, whenever the demand arises. There is the Cummins type, who fights long years and wins signally by the help of voters in the opposite party—men who think the principle is more to be considered than party lines, and then so longs after party regularity that he slaps his independent supporters in the face by declaring that the worst candidate in his party is better than the best in the opposite one. There is the La Follette type, who says, "I would not knowingly aid in the election of any man because he happened to be on the Republican ticket. unless his past record and affiliations warrant the belief that he would better serve the people than his opponent." There is the Taft type, that thinks the best way to get progresive legislation is by urging a conservative kind and enlisting the aid of those who are notorious in their opposition to it because they should be convinced by the signs of the times that it must be done to save the party. And finally, there is the Roosevelt kind that would ignore political differences and make the campaign on "the old moralities," striving to keep the party united, supporting both the moderate insurgent and all but the most notorious Stand-patter and follow a frank policy of opportunism in order to get things progressive done in a conservative way. The Democrats passed through this same sifting and grading process during the years from 1896 to 1906, and unless the signs fail, it is not all of one-mind yet.

Roosevelt—Devoured or Eclipsed?

When the sun goes into eclipse in China, the people imagine a great dragon is devouring it. Some of Mr. Roosevelt's fond haters think the dragon of party defeat has the impeccable Colonel in its maw. What he thinks of the election is not revealed at this writing, and the light minded find it easy to play puns on the "oyster" in the name of his abiding place. His admirers can only regret that his fighting spirit led him to so far forsake "the old moralities" in the closing days of the campaign as to make bitter personal attacks on most of the men he was opposing. All of these men were elected. But Roosevelt, with characteristic personal courage, jumped into the breach in almost every case. He fought where the battle was hottest and defeat most looked for. No exception can be taken to anything in his speeches so long as he kept to a discussion of principles. He was frankly progressive in his own contentions and quite as frankly committed to party regularity, adopting the Cummins' theory, with moral exceptions, and preaching that progress could best be won through deflecting the direction of the party. Mr. Roosevelt is an unalloyed opportunist. We all are to a greater or less extent, but again—there are types of opportunism. Mr. Bryan preaches what he thinks theoretically right, without regard to consequences. Mr. Roosevelt advocates that measure of the right which he feels may win today and takes up a new measure as a next step after the victory is won. The one is a Jefferson, the other is a Jackson method. But if any of Mr. Roosevelt's fond friends of the opposition think he is devoured, they will be seeing ghosts ere long. He may be in a temporary eclipse, but he will emerge. The American people like hard hitting and personal courage and they are not at all afraid of the man who changes his mind, so long as they feel he is honest. Mr. Roosevelt will be at the forefront again. His opportunism is of the sort that makes for leadership in an immediate issue. He knows how to keep ahead, but not too far ahead, and at heart he is an Insurgent. He may have thought it judicious to try to keep both horses in the track and so have fallen between, but it is safe to say he will brush off the dust and resume the ride with a smile.

Why Mr. Bryan Smiles

Mr. Bryan was thrice defeated by the "bolters," but he never uttered a word of ill-will about them. On the contrary, he smilingly offered them a back-seat when they sought to return. This year he turned bolter himself, and his was a winning bolt. Mayor Dahlman, of Omaha, won the Democratic nomination for governor by the help of the berwery interests of both parties. Bryan said he was against the domination of special interests of any kind in politics, but that above all he would never sit by while the brewery interests dominated. The Dahlman crowd voted down the principle of local option in the making of the platform. Bryan bolted Dahlman and defeated him by a goodly majority. He advocated local option, and enough local option Democrats were elected to guarantee its enactment. He advocated the election of a Democratic progressive against Mr. Burkett, who had kept himself "regular" in the last Congress, and won. Then he smiles broadly over the triumph of men like La Follette. Insurgency advocates so many things that he has been defeated for advocating that he feels a very pardonable pride in the results, though he may not be at one with all the Insurgents stand for. Progressive Republicanism advocates the principle of protection; progressive Democracy, that of tariff for revenue. But both are for radical reductions. And this matter of "how much" is about their only difference, aside from that of fealty to party ties and traditions. Both are against monopoly, the power of privileged interests and autocracy in party rule. Both are in favor of strict governmental regulation of railroads and trusts for the conservation of natural resources. Both are against the processes of injunction as it has been used, and both are for the popular power to revise legislative acts through referendums. Beneath all passing issues these are the things the "Commoner" has preached for the past twenty years and unless the signs of the times fail his smile is not likely to come off.

Editorial Table Talk

Study and Travel Combined

The complete itinerary of the University of Chicago Travel Class to Egypt and Palestine under the direction of Professor Theo. G. Soares, has just been issued. The class sails from New York, Jan. 28, on the "Martha Washington." A month is spent in Egypt, especially careful study being given to Luxor and its vicinity. Over a month is devoted to Palestine, including two weeks camping. The class visits Damascus, Beirut, Constantinople, Athens and closes in Naples, May 5. The plan contemplates daily lectures on the steamer and throughout the tour. University credit is given to those who undertake special study, although the class is a kind of University Extension that is open to the public.

What Do Our Readers Say?

Shall the Daily Altar page be continued after December 31? This question will be left to our readers to answer. In view of the constant stream of appreciative and grateful letters that have been coming to the editors through the year, there is little doubt what the answer will be. It is the purpose of Professor Willett to allow this year's work to be published in book form. The book cannot be produced, however, before next spring. Meantime, many who have grown accustomed to using the Daily Altar exercises in their family and private devotions will feel the need of some daily help. Dr. Willett has expressed a willingness to continue the department if there is a call for it by The Christian Century readers. The editors will be glad to receive a note from those who have discovered the great beauty and value of the Daily Altar and wish its continuance, at least until the book appears.

A School of Peace

Very recently there has been founded in Boston, Mass., an International School of Peace, under the immediate direction of Edwin Ginn, of Ginn & Company, and with a membership composed of such people as President Eliot, Andrew Carnegie, Doctor Trueblood of the American Peace Society, and Edwin D. Mead. The object of the school is to further the interests of peace throughout the world by influencing the press to uphold peace programs; by exchanging teachers and students between countries, by the method already in valuable practice; by introducing a greater emphasis on the civil side of history in the school, that the warlike aspects may not so persistently impress young students; by working toward a practical disarmament of the armies and navies of the world; and by advocating national schools for the preparation of civil affairs, to rank with West Point and Annapolis. Mr. Ginn, heartily believing that this sort of an organization, guided by men of sound judgment, and backed by adequate finances, is the crying need of the present day, has pledged $50,000 annually to its support, and has sent out a universal call for coöperation and assistance in the enterprise.

Let It Be Reformed Altogether

An editorial note in the Christian-Evangelist is as follows:

An honored and widely-known brother writes to know if the Christian-Evangelist will make any reply to the criticism of the "Strategic Problems of Religion," contained in an editorial in one of our esteemed contemporaries. No, we think not formally, but we trust that every issue of our paper, with its emphasis of things deemed fundamental to faith and service, does reply, indirectly but convincingly, to the implications of that criticism.

The reference is, of course, to the articles published some weeks since in The Christian Century. This paper approves the method of its esteemed contemporary in choosing to make each issue a reply to our earnest strictures. The next issue appearing after the criticisms were published seemed to be a particularly decisive reply. In that issue three of the six points made by The Christian Century against the motto were corrected: "A Religion of Service" was added, "A United Church or No Christianity" was revised, and the title, "Strategic Points in the Ultimate Religion of the World" was displaced by "Five Inevitable Issues." This was getting a larger proportion of our game than The Christian Century expected. We owe an apology, too, for letting so long a time elapse before recording the change of front of our good neighbor. And do we dare hope, from the above quoted statement that every issue will be a reply, that succeeding issues will finally grant the three other points of our criticism and abolish from the motto the straw issues which divert the hearts of our brotherhood from the big enterprise we are here to accomplish? This would probably be hoping too much. But The Christian Century is optimistic, and seriously predicts that the time will come when the objectionable features of that motto will be reformed or removed altogether.

Amazing Triumph of Modern Christianity

In a passage of extraordinary distinction Bishop Morrison in his sermon at the Cincinnati Episcopal Convention, passed optmistic judgment upon modern religious conditions. "In days to come," he said, "when men look back to the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, they will not dwell on what troubles us today; they will read with wonder of our fears and complaints; they will mention only incidentally the loss of religious practice, the want of faith, the uncertain note in religious teaching, the small congregations; the surprise will be, when once men get the happenings and life of these centuries into perspective, that the church continued to gain in numbers and influence, that money was given so freely, that there was spirit and life for great religious movements, that a vision of Christ's conquest of the world encouraged and entranced so many, that the prophet announced so confidently: 'The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand!' Surprise and wonder indeed, for in days to come men will see that the mind of man changed front in the nineteenth century; that new cosmic conceptions and new knowledge of nature revolutionized men's thinking, changed social and economic conditions and gave a new expression to almost all theological expositions of religious truth. Yes, the fact which should impress us is not the unsatisfactory condition of much of our work, but the fact that even through questions and doubts and denial, through a new day of knowledge, and all the hurrying, impetuous competitions and wealth-getting and increasing luxury of modern life, the Church of Jesus Christ has done so much and is so confident of her mission.."

Bible Courses Recognized in Texas

The favorable attitude of state universities over the country toward wholesome Christian influence is a fact generally known. At least thirteen of them are giving credit for Bible courses towards the B. A. degree. The universities not giving credit are, for the most part, giving such encouragement to practical religious influences that it is little short of academic recognition. The lucid and informing address delivered at the Topeka Convention by Professor Frank L. Jewett of the Bible Chair of the University of Texas, has brought into especial prominence the work at that institution. That the University of Texas in particular has been intensely interested in fostering a real religious influence in the lives of its numerous students is a fact now becoming well known. It is developing more and more that there are many students at the University preparing for a life work as Y. M. C. A. secretaries, ministers, missionaries, and other religious professions. While at the university these students are anxious to have an opportunity to do special work in Bible study. In addition, there are students interested in Bible study for the real religious and cultural value therein. To meet the need of these particular students and to encourage others, arrangements have been made for securing credit for Bible courses. At present, the Presbyterian Seminary and the Texas Bible Chair are ready to offer such Bible courses meeting the standard and quality of courses meriting credit towards the B. A. degree. Quite a few students are taking advantage of this opportunity this year. In the coming year, both the Seminary and the Bible Chair will be much better prepared to give such courses and to take care of all students desiring such work. It is difficult to estimate the far-reaching results of this new arrangement. To say the least, it will mean much both to the university and the churches in Texas.

Plain Speaking Among Baptists

That there is a growing repugnance in the Baptist mind to the traditional practice of confining membership in their churches solely to those who agree with them on the immersion-dogma was again disclosed at the Baptist Congress held the second week of November in Augusta, Ga. This subject is becoming almost as insistent among the Baptists as among the Disciples. The fundamental character of our plea for union makes the inconsistency take on a moral quality among us Disciples which it does not have among Baptists, to whom, so far, it has not yet occurred that their sectarianism is wrong.

However, there were some speakers at the Baptist Congress who argued, from fundamental Baptist principles, that their present practice is wrong. Among these was Dr. Charles H. Dodd, of Baltimore, who contended that the ideas of soul-freedom and individual competency in religion, basic to Baptists, would, if consistently applied, do away with sectarian divisions. Unfortunately, he said, Baptists are quite as reluctant as other bodies to stand or fall by the test of these two principles. The discussion showed that there was intense unrest among northern Baptists with respect to the present procedure of immersionistic exclusiveness. President Evans, of Crozer Seminary, squarely asked, says The Standard (Chicago), how Baptist principles could exclude from membership in a Baptist church "a man whose faith and obedience are admittedly as good as ours, but who in his right of private interpretation of the Scripture does not agree with us as to the form of baptism required by Christ?"

Dr. Rufus P. Johnston, of New York, made an impassioned appeal for a purely spiritual basis of church membership. Dr. S. H. Ferris, of Philadelphia, pointed out that the truest unity is obtained by giving fullest rights to diversity within the organization.

The Standard, in summing up its report of the discussion, says that it "revealed two things, first, that the question is a burning issue in the North. There was an intensity of feeling which betrayed a great moral passion for a basis of church membership which emphasizes spiritual rather than ritual conditions. Second, that the South has no such feeling on the matter, and indeed is scarcely able to realize why Baptists should ever raise such an issue."

Under Two Flags

One of those memorable incidents which occasionally thrills a convention took place during the sessions of the American Christian Missionary Society at Topeka while Mrs. E. F. Boggess was making an appeal in behalf of Alberta, Canada. In her tender, beautiful way she was saying, "I always loved the Stars and Stripes, the most beautiful of all the emblems of earth's nations. Upon first going to Canada the sight of the Union Jack, flowing from a public building, gave me the homesick feeling that comes to a stranger in a strange land, but now I have learned to love this beautiful emblem of my new home, and I have brought this silken flag (here she unfolded a large silk flag, the national emblem of Canada) to this convention, that in the name of Alberta Christians I might present it to the American Christian Missionary Society. I wish I had the Stars and Stripes to unfold here that you might see them together. Both flags unfolded beneath the standard of the cross remind you of how the new fields in both countries are dependent upon the American Christian Missionary Society for the gospel of Christ." Mrs. Princess Long was sitting on the platform and happened to have in her pocket an American flag. It was the silken flag presented to her in appreciation of her far-famed and oft-sung patriotic medley, written and given to the world at our Jubilee convention in 1899. Ever since then this particular flag has been used at State and National Conventions and waved over the heads of thousands and thousands as they listened to Mrs. Long's singing of national hymns and participated in the inspiring patriotic airs. During this speech Mrs. Long, moved by the momentary impulse, (for she had never before seen Mrs. Boggess, and the latter's speech was not on the set program), took the flag from her pocket and threw it over the speaker's arm just as she reached the climacteric place in her improvised but eloquent address. This, of course, was the signal for a tremendous outburst of applause from the audience. The next day Mrs. Boggess asked Mrs. Long to make her a gift of the flag. Well might one hesitate to grant such a request, for the flag has many associations deeply sacred and binding. Mrs. Long explained and for a time demurred. "That is just why I want it," said the persistent, earnest little missionary from the Northwest. "Such a banner coming to Alberta freighted with hallowed association and wet with the tears of love and sacrifice, speak most eloquently of the love and fellowship which this Christian Convention has for us in our great effort to save for Christ the great empire of the Northwest." So Mrs. Long told the Convention of this request, sang once more in her own soulful way the melodious medley and gave up the cherished emblem of patriotism. Mrs. Boggess has carried it away out on the frontier where, through the years, it will speak its lesson of love, of giving and of fellowship in Christian service to the inspiration of thousands and cheer the heroes on the firing line to many a hard-earned victory. For her spontaneous act on this occasion and for the loving gift of a cherished emblem to the cause of home missions is due Mrs. Princess Long the thanks of an appreciative brotherhood.

Omissions Fatal to Character

It is a fatal omission not to use the truth which one knows. The man of one talent lost what he had because he did not use his gift. A good conscience is the possession of those who live according to the light they have. Moral insight is not something apart from conduct. It is a product of thoughtful actions. Men who invariably ask about the moral demands of the situation and act in harmony with those demands acquire what is known as common sense. We do not all have the same amount of intelligence, but our difference in the matter of common sense are not so much intellectual as moral. The shrewdness of Lincoln was that of a man who was determined to do right at any hazard.

"The great thing in all education," says William James, "is to make our nervous system our ally instead of our enemy. It is to fund and capitalize our acquisitions, and to live at ease upon the interest of the fund. For this we must make automatic and habitual, as early as possible, as many useful actions as we can, and as carefully guard against the growing into ways that are likely to be disadvantageous. The more of our daily life we can hand over to the effortless custody of automatism, the more our higher powers of mind will be set free for their own proper work." "Seize the very first opportunity to act on every resolution you make, and on every emotional prompting you may experience in the direction of the habits you aspire to gain. It is not in the moment of their forming, but in the moment of their producing motor effects, that resolves and aspirations communicate the new 'set' to the brain. No matter how full a reservoir of maxims one may possess, and no matter how good one's sentiments may be, if one have not taken advantage of every concrete opportunity to act, one's character may remain entirely unaffected for the better."

The teachings of the church must be used in daily life if they are to form character. We ought to go to church for the purpose of getting knowledge and inspiration for immediate use. Of what advantage is it to read the story of David's repentance if we count the man our enemy who in kindness tells us of our faults? What sense is there in having our emotions aroused over the miseries of the poor and ignorant if we do not at once give expression to our sympathies in acts of relief? The weakness of our religious life is that the connection between preaching and acting is often remote. We do not remain stationary. We grow, and the subject which we can do good to somebody without inconvenience to ourselves. We have no right to sing of heavenly joys unless we in some way connect them with earthly duty.

Another omission fatal to character is that of the man who does not include learning in his program. A few years ago I heard a man say, "Yes, I know all about that, I learned in 1867." Apparently he thought there was no more knowledge to be sought in that direction. This man has been a disturber of the peace of his brethren. He does not know why the church exists. The trouble with him, as with all of us, is that we overlook the dynamic character of life. We do not remain stationary. We grow, and the subject which we thought we understood thoroughly yesterday may be very puzzling today. We may refuse to have God in our knowledge by trying to hold intact our childhood conceptions of him. The faith and teachableness of childhood are becoming to maturity and old age, but the intellectual equipment of the child is not sufficient for the work of a man.

The Ahorey Church

A Visit to the Scene of Thomas Campbell's Ministry in Ireland

BY ERRETT GATES.

Thomas Campbell was called to the pastorate of the Seceder congregation at Ahorey in 1798. This was his first settled pastorate. He was in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and approaching the maturity of his powers. For nine years, he ministered to this congregation and when he left it to make his home in America, he departed amid the tears and universal regret of his people.

If in any place in Ireland, where he lived, he would be likely to make an enduring impression upon the community, this would be the place. I found traditions of the family still lingering in the memorials of the community. One of these is to the effect that Alexander was a great hunter of magpies. Richardson, in the Memoirs, tells of his fondness for hunting birds; but in my correspondence this summer, with the Rev. W. T. Latimer of Eglish, County Lyname, he spoke of the same tradition and said in a letter: "The statement about Alexander Campbell shooting magpies, was told me by a native of Ahorey. This is, of course, a tradition. I never saw the Memoirs by Richardson."

Church Confidently Identified.

The most direct connection, however, with Thomas Campbell, still left in the community, is Miss Greer, of whom I wrote in a former letter. I spent nearly two hours in her home in conversation with her concerning the Campbells. There can be no doubt that the present Ahorey church building is the one in which Thomas preached. But I had not as yet seen it, though I have thought of it, pictured it in my imagination, during the past fifteen years of my writing and lecturing about it. My troubles were all at an end when I reached the home of Miss Greer. After a light refreshment, she put at my service her jaunting car and liveried coachman, who carried me quickly behind a spirited horse to the old Ahorey meeting house. At last I felt that the goal of my pilgrimage had been reached.

A Holy Place.

Here I stood before that venerable sanctuary in which the gentle, peace-loving spirit of Thomas Campbell so often enshrined itself in spoken words, and where the youthful Alexander first took his place at the communion of the Lord's supper. It was here that that great peace-program, The Declaration and Address, was conceived, to be written out later at Washington, Pennsylvania. I felt like one upon consecrated soil. I walked round and round the building, and stepped off its dimensions, which proved to be 9x19 paces, or about 30x60 feet. Then a boy at work cutting grass in the grave-yard surrounding it, let me into the building. The pulpit is in the end opposite the entrance, back of which is a gothic window, 4 ft, 7 in. x 7 ft., with three lancets separated by mullions that intersect each other at the top. The seats are of natural pine, built in with doors to all the pews. The interior furnishing, however, is later than Thomas Campbell's time. The building has four square windows on each side, 3 ft. 2 in.x6 ft. in dimensions.

The most interesting part of the building is the stone stair-way leading up on the outside, over the front door, to a gallery across the front end, sloping toward the pulpit. I was told by Mr. A. A. Campbell in Belfast, that such a stairway was very rare, and gave evidence of great age. The building is of stone, plastered on the outside, and whitewashed. It now has a slate roof, but it was probably originally covered with a thatched roof. It is heated by a hot-water system of the most approved modern sort, installed three years ago. A small church yard, surrounds it, used as a burying ground by the community. Two of the church's former ministers are buried here. Back of the church is a two-story stone school house. These two buildings are all that constitute the Ahorey community. It is simply a country church but one of more than ordinary strength and influence for such a location. It has a settled minister, who gives all his time to the congregation and lives in the neighborhood.

Remarkable Pastoral History.

The Ahorey church has had rather a remarkable pastoral history. The ministry of two pastors, succeeding Thomas Campbell, covered nearly seventy-five years. One man was pastor for about 45 years. He died only last January and was buried in the yard beside the church.

The Ahorey Church, in which Thomas Campbell Ministered From 1798 to 1807.

First Experience in Jaunting Car.

After making a careful inspection of the church, and taking two photographs of it in a drizzling rain, I was driven in the "jaunting car" to the nearest railway station at Hanneton's Bawn, to take a train for Newry. Before proceeding further with my story, something must be said for the Irish jaunting car (or "ke-yar," as the Irish coachman calls it.) The first sight I had of one was at Portrush, when I landed from the boat. It is a two-wheeled side-seated affair, capable of the most marvellous carrying powers. It is as light as a racing sulky, and at first reminded me of one. The passengers sit on each side, over the two wheels, back to back. It will carry six passengers on the side, the driver on a seat in front, and any amount of parcels and luggage in the center between the seats and in the "well" built beneath, just over the axle. I wonder that the conveyance is not adopted in other countries; but neither England nor Scotland condescends to copy from the Irish so convenient and sensible a carriage. It is not only convenient and light, but safe. It will not upset, when turning, no matter how short; and one can step off without any delay or hindrance, if a horse takes fright. The jaunting car is to be seen waiting at all railroad stations and takes the place of the usual coupe or covered carriage.

From Ahorey to Newry.

From Ahorey, I went to Newry, where Alexander attended school several years, and near which is the small rural community of Sheepbridge, where Thomas Campbell was probably born and spent much of his early life. When Thomas moved, with his family to America, he left two brothers, Enos and Archibald, in Newry as teachers and proprietors of an academy. What became of them, I have never learned. I wanted to see the city, and make some inquiries for descendents of these uncles of Alexander, with whom he corresponded.

Inquiries at Newry.

But after a few hours inquiry for citizens by the name of Campbell, I found no one of any eminence or more than very commonplace intelligence, by that name. Nothing of importance happened in the lives of the Campbells in or about Newry to make a prolonged investigation justifiable, so I went on my way back to Belfast. Newry is on the southern border of the Protestant province of Ulster. It is a shiping port of about 16,000 population, and is so close to the Catholic stronghold of Ireland, as to be largely influenced by it. The city possesses a new Roman Catholic cathedral of really imposing proportions, in light grey granite, and gothic style.

Returning to Belfast, I spent two days in and about the city, waiting for a boat to carry me across to Ayr, the land of Robert Burns. While I was waiting, I made a trip to Antrim, back toward Ballymena, to call on a Unitarian minister, who was said to have made a special study of the Campbells in Ireland. But he was able to add no new facts to those already recorded in Richardson's Memoirs.

Unitarians Especially Strong.

In the process of my inquiries into religious conditions in Ireland, I learned that there were more Unitarian churches here than in Scotland. There are 38 such churches in Ireland, while there are only 7 in Scotland. This is due to the Unitarian defection that took place in Presbyterian churches in the early part of the nineteenth century which carried many Presbyterian churches over to Unitarianism. Unitarianism is, however, of a more evangelical type in Ireland, than in other parts of Great Britain, due to its historic origin and its close contact with Presbyterianism. Most of these churches were originally Presbyterian.

Ireland Feeding England.

I took passage on the regular passenger boat from Belfast to Ayr, but found only two passengers of the genus homo, while there were 500 head of cattle and as many sheep on board, bound for the markets of Scotland and England. England is fed by other countries, and Ireland, to my surprise, furnishes no small part of her food. I was told by the boat steward that this one shipping line out of Belfast carried, during the last twelve months, 55,000 head of cattle alone, to England, besides many thousand head of sheep and other produce. Other Irish shipping ports such as Londonderry, Newry, Farne, Dublin and Drogheda, are pouring a constant stream of live-stock and produce into England. No wonder England is so fondly attached to Ireland.

I returned to Glasgow and the university to take up the serious part of my quest for memorial remains of the student days of the Campbells.

My next letter will deal with the Campbell's at the University of Glasgow.

After Many Days

A Frank and Searching Study of the Disciples' Work

BY ALBERT J. SAUNDERS.

Some years ago I was much interested in a story called "The Evolution of a Preacher." Another book may be written today called "The Crises or Transitions of a Soul." No thoughtful young man can study and travel in these times without experiencing the pangs, the anxieties, the readjustments of this transitional period.

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
And God fulfils himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

We are well aware of the changes in the physical organism as we pass from stage to stage. No less certain, marked, and insistent are the changes in the mental and soul life under stimulating environment. The soul grows. Its outlook enlarges. Its conclusions may alter. It asks liberty to investigate, to readjust as new situations arise. Why should we seek to bind the soul of free men!

Aids to Soul Growth.

There are two indispensable aids to soul growth—education and travel. Given these two aids and the soul must grow. True education is training in perspective. The school is not the place to absorb a certain number of facts. The school performs its function when it directs. It is designed to stimulate right attitudes toward the great problems of life. Education should teach us how to live, to control, to think. Education is a process of soul culture. Travel is the complement of formal education. The schools are largely theoretical. Travel is intensely practical. One is taken out of his own little world; he sees men and movements in operation upon similar problems to those of his own country, and he at once becomes interested in methods. The absorbing interest of our day is in methods. Travel is educational. And both have a broadening effect upon the normal, unfettered soul.

Revelations of Study and Travel.

These thoughts are expressed by one who has both studied and traveled. Study and travel have revealed to me many things of which I cannot now speak, but three things stand out in bold relief, and are ever present in our thought. Sectarianism is a very persistent spirit in our ranks. We have all been taught to disavow the terms—sect, denomination; but the spirit is among us. To pinch off a little corner, to build a high wall around it, to force minds to adjust themselves to its narrow limits, to make that corner the only sacred place in God's universe, and the only habitation of God's people is sectarian. The term Christian is being applied to good, earnest people of every religious party today, and the organization which refused recognition to those people who can pass a character and Christian spirit test is sectarian. Beware of the man who has the sum total of divine truth. Beware of the religious organization which is alone right. Truth is too large, too potential, too infinite, to be grasped by one man, or controlled by one set of men. Sectarianism imprisons truth.

It is said that at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth of England, a courtier besought the release of certain prisoners. It was on this wise: A pageant had been represented, a figure symbolic of Time appeared, and with Time came Truth, daughter of Time. A book lay in her hand on which was written "Verbum Veritatis," and this she gave to the queen. On the morrow a courtier came with a request: "Would her majesty be pleased to release four or five principal prisoners—Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and Paul—who had been shut up in an unknown tongue, and could not converse with the people."

Requirements of New Time.

This incident suggests a message for our day. Time in a new dress stands waiting, and near him, Truth, also freshly attired. They require of us a restatement and readjustment of this same sacred book—the Bible of the English-speaking people. How applicable are the words of the Psalmist: "I cried to the Lord with my voice, bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name." The spirit of the Bible, the spirit of our religion cries for release. It is bound in a cross traditional literalism, which is thwarting the very purposes of God.

After many days the convictions is forced upon me that we are in the great majority a sectarian and proselyting people. Sectarianism is, however, dying in our ranks, but it is dying hard. The spirit of our age exemplified in the passion for foreign missions, and that great world conference in Edinburgh is diametrically opposed to sectarianism. And if our plea for Christian union is to continue and have influence with men, the narrow, pharisaical, sectarian spirit, which has too long been encouraged in our midst, must be succeeded by the free spirit of tolerance, cooperation and union.

Various Causes of Division.

When one searches for the fundamental strings which divide Christian people, at once a score of differing methods and practices come before one. There is church polity. Our nomenclature is so different. Methods vary; there is a long and sacred history behind them all. But are they fundamental? Can we afford any longer to remain divided over these things? Have we not in the past allowed too much sentiment and emotion in a consideration of these matters, and far too little of earnest effort of deep thinking men face to face with the greatest of Christian problems? Said a Chinese at the Edinburgh conference: "China is not interested in your denominationalism." The things that divide are of little moment to the men who are set for the accomplishment of the greatest good to the greatest number. The name problem, open or close communion, higher criticism, and many other questions are gradually righting themselves through the building process of time. But with us in all probability the last great controversy will rage around baptism.

Disciples Must Face Fair Question.

Now, we must face this question fairly and squarely. What is our specific function in the religious world? Is it to champion a religious rite? or is it to contribute something of permanent value to a world religious problem—the torn body of our Lord? What is baptism? Its function is to express a spiritual recreation. Which is the vital and essential experience—the heart and life change or the expression of it? Every right thinking person will at once answer: the vital thing is the changed heart and life. This is the united voice of Christendom. We are one in the position that upon character and life rests discipleship.. How can we afford to remain apart on an expression of that experience? After many days the conviction has been forced upon me that the only solution to this whole disturbing problem is to allow freedom of expression.

Has not the time fully come when we should change our emphasis from the expression of a change to the change itself, allowing liberty to the individual of expression of that change? Personally, I would that every one might be baptized by immersion upon a profession of faith; but since there are millions of earnest Christians who have not and will not be thus baptized, can we afford to perpetuate this dead-lock to hinder the union accomplishment and, worst of all, retard the kingdom of God? I see here a responsibility which we must consider. Are we yet prepared to lose our identity in the accomplishment of that for which we were called into being? Let us cease to emphasize the things that divide, and let us unite and get to work on the things held in common.

Kingdom Helped On by Agreements.

"That which all Christian churches hold in common is so far in excess of that which separates them, that the kingdom of God cannot advance upon the preaching of differences, but only upon preaching that which is held in common."

Our final word must ever be Christian union. But after many days it has come to me that mechanical union cannot be expressed. We shall never again have one great organization similar to the church of Rome ruling the religious world. And there are few persons outside of that communion who desire it. The kingdom of God is within you. The only possible solution to the union problem seems to be along the lines of spirit, attitude and service. Is it not coming just that way?

Look at the great missionary convention in Chicago, men of many varying beliefs yet one in spirit, wish a common attitude, and passion for service. Behold, that greater conference in Edinburgh, men from north, south, east and west, of many faiths, yet one in a common interest. My brethren, these things are highly significant. Shall we be blind to their significance? It is the solution of God's spirit to a problem which has baffled us. Union is here in part now, and the east again furnishes the morning star. It has been suggested that a propaganda of union be instituted; if rightly managed, and in moderation, that should be productive of good. The educational and inspirational value of such a campaign would be great. A union conscience needs to be developed, and with hopeful hearts turned toward the future which promises so much we may say with Dean Farrar:

Dean Farrar's Creed.

"I believe in the church of the future. I think there is a day not very far distant, when from the watch towers of Asia, once the land of lords—many, there shall roll out the excellent chorus, One Lord! When from the watch towers of Europe, distracted by divisions in the faith, there shall roll up the great chorus, One Faith! When from the watch towers of America, torn by the baptismal controversy, there shall roll forth the inspiring chorus, One Baptism! When from the watch towers of Africa, as though the God of all the race were not her God, as if the Father of the entire family were not her Father, when from the watch towers of neglected and despised Africa there shall roll forth the chorus, One God and Father of us all! When the Lord's people scattered over the face of this lower creation, shall spring upon their feet, and, seizing the harp of thanksgiving, they shall join in the chorus that shall be responded to by God and Father of us all, and in us all: to whom be glory, dominion and majesty, and blessing for ever!'"

The Logic of the League

How Anti-Saloon Forces Conceive Their Warfare

BY E. J. DAVIS.'

[The author of this article is one of the most active and consecrated laymen in Chicago, working constantly on behalf of all civic reform and moral progress. As a leader in the prohibition movement, he is keenly aware of the weakened influence of the prohibition forces on account of divided convictions as to ways and means. With us, he regards the degree of coöperation recently attained betwen the Prohibitionists and the Anti-Saloon league with satisfaction, and presents this argument as a contribution to a further rapproachment.—EDITORS.]

Many men are divided in their views as to whether they should express their power against the liquor traffic through the Anti-Saloon League or in the ranks of the Prohibition party. To take the most charitable view of the situation some men have such strong convictions that the only place for Christian men is within the ranks of the Prohibtion party, that they have felt called upon to make very bitter attacks upon the Anti-Saloon League. Some of them justify their attacks upon the contention that the Anti-Saloon League is morally wrong and therefore without defense. They say no permanent progress can be made against the liquor evil as long as the Anti-Saloon League is in the field; that it that organization were out of the way then the moral sense of the people would become so aroused that they would rise up and destroy the business.

The Question of Expediency.

Their idea is that the Prohibition party occupies the only high ground of moral purpose while the Anti-Saloon League takes the lower ground of expediency, and in the realms or morals no man is justified to act on grounds of expediency which do not square with the highest moral perceptions. On the other hand many good men believe the method of the Anti-Saloon League is not only practicable, but that its position is morally right and that it is not justifiable for good citizens to withdraw from participation in the affairs of the dominant parties, leaving them to the control of the underworld. They stand squarely on the position that the underworld element have no right to be allowed to be in control of either party and that by concerted action they can be driven out of both parties.

Between these two positions there is a wide gulf in method and action only. It seems to me that there should be a dispassionate examination of the fundamentals of the subject by every citizen. Every man who desires to be led by his moral and religious convictions must face this question for himself.

Prohibition Party Logic.

One of the leaders of the Prohibition party lays down the following syllogism as the basis of their position:

I. Major Premise.

No County, Township or village, has the right to legalize a wrong.

Minor Premise.

Liquor selling is wrong.

Conclusion.

No community has the right to legalize liquor selling.

Based on this their reasoning might be reduced to two further syllogisms as follows:

II. Major Premise.

Local Option laws provide for legalizing liquor selling.

Minor Premise.

The Anti-Saloon League favors Local Option laws.

Conclusion.

Therefore the Anti-Saloon League is wrong.

III. Major Premise.

It is right and commendable for Christian men to attack that which is wrong.

Minor Premise.

The Anti-Saloon League is wrong. (see second syllogism.)

Conclusion.

Therefore it is right and commendable for Christian men to attack the Anti-Saloon League.

Analysis of the Syllogism.

From reading the papers, the speeches, and the letters of Prohibition party men there is no escape from the conclusion that there are many of their leaders who believe there is no flaw in the above line of reasoning. But let us start with the first syllogism. What is the matter with it? Nothing. It is perfectly sound as a moral proposition. The fallacy lies in the deductions drawn from it. Let us state another line of syllogisms:

IV. Major Premise.

The right of the people of a state or of a nation to choose its course is conceded upon every question that is submitted to the popular vote.

Minor Premise.

The Prohibition party proposes to submit to popular vote the question of abolishing the liquor traffic.

Conclusion.

Therefore the Prohibition party concedes the right of the people to choose whether it shall continue to license the liquor evil.

Another Syllogism.

But according to the first syllogism laid down by the Party Prohibitionist leader this is wrong. Therefore this leads us to another syllogism.

V. Major Premise.

Any party which favors granting to the state or nation the option of electing to do an evil thing should not exist.

Minor Premise.

The Prohibition party proposes to vote upon the question whether the state shall abolish the liquor evil.

Conclusion.

Therefore the Prohibition party should be abolished

Both Correct as Abstractions.

As propositions in abstract morals both of these lines of reasoning are correct. The same syllogism that puts out of business the Anti-Saloon League takes with it the Prohibition party. These conclusions cannot be escaped from. If it is wrong for the city to vote upon this proposition then it is wrong for the state or the Nation. But I hear a Prohibitionist say, "Our platform does not provide for voting on the question every two years as does the Local Option platform. When we vote it out we vote it out forever and if the Local Option law provided for banishing the saloon forever when it was once voted out or for absolute prohibition then we would favor it." The heresy they see in the Local Option plan is in allowing the city to vote to again license an evil when it is once driven out.

Carrie Nation's Method.

If that is true then it is wrong to vote upon the question in the first place as has already been demonstrated, for voting presupposes the right of choice when there is no moral right of choice. This leaves the method of Carrie Nation the only correct one. Let us take an axe and go out and destroy the first saloon we come across, standing flat footed upon our rights and upon the contention that the saloon has no moral right to exist; that the law has no powers not founded on moral right and therefore the law has no right to punish us for this act.

This would mean identically what Lincoln's position on the Kansas-Nebraska Act lead to—Civil War, only this war would be in every town, village and hamlet in the nation where a saloon exists, instead of being between well defined sections of the nation as it was in the Civil War. The question of slavery was not settled as an abstract moral question. Lincoln said slavery is wrong. The south said Lincoln is wrong—We will secede. The north said Lincoln is right; the south shall not set up an independent nation with slavery, and the question was settled by force of arms. If the south had won, slavery would have continued.

Analogue in Slavery Battle.

If Lincoln had been defeated in the election of 1864 and a "peace democrat" had won then slavery would have continued. In other words it took the majority sentiment to kill slavery. It should be borne in mind that under the law, liquor selling is not a crime. The League seeks to get the enactment of laws which make it a crime. It also should be remembered that the Kansas-Nebraska situation, on which Lincoln became famous, is not parallel with local option or the liquor question. Slavery did not exist in Kansas. It was free territory. The Anti-Saloon League advocates local option only where the liquor traffic is tolerated by the laws of the state, and with the purpose of the ultimate extinction of the liquor business.

If the people of this state should elect the Prohibition party to power and declare for prohibition there would be notihng to hinder them turning round at the next election and voting them out and declaring for a policy of license. Therefore, the difference between the Prohibition party and the Anti-Saloon League is purely one of method not of principles or morals and it becomes a matter of choice for men to decide which is the more efficient way.

The Anti-Saloon League stands on the platform that the saloon power has no place in the control of either party and that by raising the issue within the parties they can be driven out of one or both parties. This method has worked in Kansas. It has worked in North Carolina. In one state in the Republican party, in the other in the Democratic. This principle upholds the hands of Governor Stubbs in Kansas and has made it the most completely prohibition of any state. It has driven the unspeakable Patterson in Tennessee in ignominy from public life. Would Prohibitionists in Kansas be justified in nominating a man against Governor Stubbs?

Under very adverse circumstances the Anti-Saloon plan secured a protest vote of about 50,000 for a prohibition candidate for State's attorney in Chicago. It has made a good part of the state of Illinois dry territory. Such towns as Galesburg are undoubtedly forever dry. The people may and ought to compel the next candidate for governor to take a flat-footed stand. They probably will soon go down into each ward in the city and compel aldermen to take a stand upon one side of the other. It forces a hearing and drives the question directly into every home in the state with an immediate issue. What part has the party prohibitionist in this great war that is going on? Purely academic. A candidate in the Republican or Democratic parties says, "I will stand against this traffic." A prohibitionist cannot help nominate him. A man stands up squarely against the liquor interests in the legislature and comes back for re-election. He receives no support from the Prohibition party at the Primaries. Pursuing the policy of the Anti-Saloon League the conditions which prevail in Kansas may be brought about in Illinois, and at no remote date the liquor traffic can be absolutely destroyed in all territory where the flag of the nation floats over its own possessions.

The Layman's Spiritual Leadership

BY J. S. KIRTLEY.

Mark the words "spiritual" and "leadership" and catch the significance of both terms, in the light of the present phase of the layman's great movement. The layman's uprising has been most vital and refreshing, but, unless I am much astray in my readings and my reasonings, we are waiting for it to enter its crowning, most fruitful stage. It is not a spent force; if so, it would be only a farce. It is just now getting at itself.

Epidemic of Responsibility.

The infection of the laymen of all churches and creeds, with the conviction that they are here for something, is still a process and goes steadily on. The Catholic church is in the current. Its great Eucharistic Congress, recently held at Montreal, brought out its laymen and they have laid plans for the complete infection of their body with the layman idea. The Episcopal church started its Brotherhood of St. Andrew nearly twenty years ago and, in its annual convention at Cincinnati, the other day, it put its stately and solemn stress on work for men, in the noted laymen who spoke and in their plans to make the recent loss of Mr. Houghteling, the founder of the Brotherhood, an occasion for kindling afresh their zeal for men. All the larger religious bodies have their men's organizations, state and national and local.

The vitality and activity of the laymen is in evidence, in the great conventions and conferences which will make the years 1909 and 1910 forever memorable and in the improved methods of securing money for home expenses and missions. That cannot be lost, for, besides the interest aroused, machinery has been created and manned, larger gifts have come, thus setting a new standard that cannot fail to influence future giving, and a taste for this sort of doing has been developed, which nothing else can ever satisfy. The best of it is that men are giving themselves as well as their money, doing personal work in personal ways.

What is Leadership?

The next step must be in what I have tried to connote under this topic. Let a few words be said, by way of definition. By spiritual, we do not mean emotional, or ecstatic, or rhetorical, or intellectual, or esthetic, but something that lies back of them and gives its own quality to whatever one has of any or all of these. It is simply the personal, chosen attitude of one's spirit toward God, who is a spirit, the degree in which one gets the right attitude, by learning of him in the word, seeing him in Jesus, receiving him through the mediation of the Holy Spirit and daily doing his will. One who maintains that best attitude, with all his power, will be spiritually-minded, whether he be emotional or a cool logician, or a driving executive. The other word "leadership" needs a slight illumination. The pastor is the normal and chosen leader of the church, in all its life and activities. But his limitations, their limitless needs, and the diversified work require that leadership be distributed to secondary centers and thus all needs be served, all talents utilized, and all work done. Leadership, in securing that right attitude, is as much of a calling as in the Sunday-school and financial and benevolent work.

Laymen's Work in Chicago.

That leadership is, in part, realized in the laymen's evangelistic campaigns now going on, both local and national. The Chapman and Alexander meetings, in Chicago, were started and are being conducted by laymen, of course, with the definite co-operation of the churches and pastors. The work is done by a local organization. But there is a national organization, which will hold conferences in the central cities all over our country, this autumn and winter, to stimulate personal and concerted work for the salvation of souls. The Episcopal laymen have been conspicuously active in many large cities, in securing desirable suburban lots, for future church buildings, and conducting Sunday-schools and missions at their own expense, until they are ready to organize churches and secure ministers. That leadership is still further realized in the few who know how to deal with those who are in need of a Savior and can put them in possession of "the gift of God" which is "eternal life through Jesus Christ, our Lord."

The Spiritual Element Essential.

But the leadership is complete only when it is a spiritual leadership that comes out of the life. That means the simple life. Leading laymen are to lead in this. The simple life does not eliminate the complex elements of our times, but it reduces them to harmonious and co-operative order, by putting the first thing first, "The kingdom of God and his righteousness," which always leads to the right attitude toward man and duty. A conscious, sustained and controlling response of the spirit to God makes all relationships, callings and duties sacred. This gets into one's emotions, however fluent or phlegmatic, into his resolves and plans and work. This is the spiritual life. The leading laymen must lead in this, with the concrete instances which they furnish.

One urgent reason for this insistence upon the spiritual is the false notion that the finer religious experiences are the exclusive privilege of women and some exceptional men, who hold an office that requires that experience or have the "religious temperament," whatever that may mean. It is just as difficult to spiritualize a highly emotional as a coldly intellectual or a highly executive nature. Women have their problem, to pragmatize and spiritualize these priceless impulses of theirs; men have a corresponding problem, to put the first thing first, for the sake of their souls and their professions, and their associates, and the rest of the church especially the young men, who get the stroke, not from the pastor, but from the men "higher up," in the world's work.

Laymen—World Leaders.

In this leadership, they are to render their best service outside of the church, in bringing the commercial and industrial and civic into their proper relation to that "first" thing of all.

Financing the church, booming the missionary revival, taking pride in helping on the evangelistic campaign conducted by laymen, buying lots and planting missions in the suburbs, all of this is so right and so admirable we cannot ask more. Yes, we can ask them to go into their professions as something God has provided for them, to choose the aim God has chosen for them, to get into his plans, enjoy his presence, work with his power, to be his partners, his fellow laborers out there, in the world and with the world's people. They become a silent as well as a shouting force against every form of corruption. Mr. Ridgeway, the iron master of Coatesville, says it may sound bold, but it ought to be correct to say "God and Co." The pastor is the laymen's leader, but the laymen are the world's leaders. The unfinished task of the laymen is to get men to have a sense of God, who is right here with them, to spiritualize commercial and industrial and civic life. And perhaps we might say that the unfinished task of our Christian women is to do the same for the social life.

Two Cautions—Not Too Cautious.

Two cautions must be observed, though one must not become too cautious. As the exact purpose is to make the spiritual life practicable to every one, whatever his temperament or calling, cant phrases about God may have the opposite effect of making it seem unattainable, not to say undesirable, and may possibly create the impression that it is unreal. The other caution: It is a cheap and not a courageous pastime to berate the church and overrate one's surpassing goodness in doing so. Loyalty to the instrument and the group of people through whom our greatest blessings have come to us ought to be a matter of honor. All the advance one makes must enrich the church and make it more attractive to those outside and more potent with them.

England's Open Door Policy in Politics and Religion

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

There is no country in the world which throws so wide open her doors as does England. It has been only a few years that there has been any alien legislation at all, and even now the regulations are far more generous than in almost any other country. Companies of under 20 can enter without examination or hindrance. There are any number of people, even now, who oppose any sort of restrictions being made.

England's Tolerant Spirit.

But it is with the religious liberty that is granted, that I want specially to speak. We sometimes think that all of the older countries are more narrow and bigoted, than are the younger ones, and in some respects perhaps we might learn some good lessons from the colonies and from America, but the fact that England is just now being offered as an asylum to the members of so many religious orders rejected from continental countries, surely silences any critics who may find fault because of religious bigotry. A few years ago an adverse legislation drove thousands of monks and nuns from France, and England received the greater portion, and now when the new Republic of Portugal takes similar action the shores of England become their chief refuge. Statistics go to show that convents and monasteries have doubled over and over again in England during the last few years, and while there are many protests on the part of individuals and ultra-protestant societies, they still come, and are granted all the liberties of our free institutions. There are two classes of people who misinterpret this attitude of liberty. There are those radical Protestants, who feel it is an indication that England is becoming retrograde with regard to Protestant principles. They predict that the time is soon at hand when Rome will be reinstated with all her former power and influence and with the attendant persecutions.

Rome's Mis-reading of Events.

On the other hand there are probably those who are more or less in sympathy with the movement toward Rome, who also misinterpret this action. Some of these are influenced doubtless to give their allegiance to the Roman Catholic church, because they do not understand the spirit in which this country of free institutions extends welcome to those who do not agree with them. Doubtless Rome herself imagines that a great section of England is about to bow the knee to the pope and again put on the yoke.

The facts of the case are that English liberty and charity are the products of the very opposite principles from those of Rome. If we were more in sympathy, we might have even less charity. It is not to be denied that this movement toward Rome is strong in the high church party, which probably will not stop until many of their number have gone over to the papal see, but there are no signs that this is at all general amongst the masses of the people. England is thoroughly protestant and Roman Catholicism has no real chance.

Disciple Minister's Experience.

Our minister at Lancaster, Henry A. Procter, has been having a taste of Roman Catholic bigotry. There is a very large Catholic population in Lancaster, and the Bishop of Liverpool, Dr. Whiteside, recently paid a visit to the community. In the course of his remarks he alluded to baptism as a symbol of the second and spiritual birth, and said that, at the moment children were baptized, they received sanctified grace. Before the ordinance their souls were stained with original sin, or, as stated in one report, their souls were as black as night. The natural implication being, of course, that the children of all Protestants were doomed to be left in that state, since the baptismal rite administered by a priest, was denied them. Mr. Procter took the opportunity, on a recent occasion to speak some strong words by way of comment on this position, though he did it in a most kindly way. But the statement to which exception was more especially taken, was the admonition of Dr. Whiteside to the Roman Catholic community, to be bigoted Catholics—not in the sense he said of being bigoted in an unreasonable way, but to be bigoted so far as Protestantism is concerned. Mr. Procter reminded him that this advice did not come with good taste at the time when England was throwing her doors open to the refugees of many Roman Catholic countries, where they had been driven out by those who had become sick and tired of their arrogant ways, and more especially did his words fall with disfavour upon the ears of the people of Lancaster, since they were on the point of electing as mayor of the town a Roman Catholic.

The practice of tolerance is bound to win for it is the spirit of the Master, who admonished the turning of the other cheek also.

Complacency Toward American Disciples.

Our people are but a feeble folk in England, but we are able to look with complacency upon the agitation which is now being aroused amongst our American churches by the urgency for a closer co-operation between the churches and for the adoption of the delegate convention. We have had just such a co-operation, and have held just such conventions, during the past 20 years. The result is that we have no churches that are not co-operating churches, and very seldom one that does not contribute. As a rule they are all represented at our annual gatherings.

The wisdom of such men as W. T. Moore, J. H. Garrison, H. S. Earl and Timothy Coop, in the early days of our work in this country is to be commended.

One who studies the history of our work, during the past hundred years, cannot help feeling that the religious conditions prevalent in early days, had as much to do with the shaping of the sentiments and forming the organization as had New Testament principles themselves.

New Testament to be Re-studied.

There were certain evils manifest in the religious world that had to be combated. Certain abuses that had to be overthrown. In order to do this it was needful to take a strong stand on some points, even at the risk of over emphasis and exaggeration. The object has been largely achieved to the detriment of present efficiency. The instruments that have served us during the past hundred years, must needs be subjected to a new test, and if need be, discarded and replaced by others. We need to study anew the New Testament principles in the light of present day conditions. Principles are eternal, but their application varies with varying conditions.

Some significant things were said at the recent Congregational union meetings held at Dr. Horton's church at Hamstead, London. One session was devoted entirely to Christian unity. The following report of this session is taken from the daily press.

Presiding at an evening meeting, the Master of the Rolls, (Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy) said they were met to demonstrate the essential unity of the Christian Church, notwithstanding the diversities of church government. There was a growing desire for more unity. The fact that hymns written by Nonconformists were sung in Westminster Abbey, and hymns written by Anglicans were largely used in Dissenting churches was a proof that fundamentally the Christian church was one in spite of its seeming divisions.

Canon Hensley Henson on Union.

Canon Hensley Henson said the subject of unity was one on which the conscience of the Christian church was deeply exercised. There had been a great deal of talk, but very little practical action.

He submitted two propositions—first, in any movement towards unity the church must go forward, and not backward; and, second, in the unity of the future, little emphasis must be placed on the particular form of ecclesiastical government which it might be pleased to adopt. One of the great principles of the Church of England is that at the Reformation the distinction between clerics and laymen was abolished, and this destroyed the essence of sacerdotalism in the Anglican church. He repudiated the view of episcopacy, held by the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Birmingham. Such a view was not held by the large majority of the lay members of the Church of England. It would be fatuous to select any one ecclesiastical system as the indispensable condition of Christian union.

Baptists and Congregationalists.

The Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, the secretary of the Baptist union, said the special witness of this generation was the demand for unity. Within certain limits the unity of the free churches was complete. The four great denominations exchanged pulpits and members and worked in the closest harmony. And yet denominationalism had lost its grip on the people, and the man at the corner looked upon the different sections with amazement. Yet their unity was a real thing. Was it not possible that the great denominations united, would make a strong and perfect church? No one could justify the present division, and if a start must be made what was to prevent a union between the Baptists and Congregationalists? (Loud cheers.)

Getting Down to Fundamentals.

At another session Rev. J. Morgan Gibson, in one of the best addresses given at the meetings, referred to the divided state of the church, saying that diversity was not always to be deprecated. There had been times, he said, when the only alternative to Roman Catholicism was atheism. One cannot help feeling that the excuse is somewhat lame, as the necssity for an alternative to Romanism is one thing and the necessity for alternatives to the many varying forms of Protestantism is quite another. Surely we are not far from the day when we will get down to such bedrock fundamentals, that we will not feel it necessary to organize, or to continue to maintain, a separate organization for the propagation of every varying conception of Christianity.

Our Readers' Opinions

Baptism in the United Church

Dear Brother Morrison:—Notwithstanding all of your careful explanations, some of us find it difficult to exactly define the position of The Christian Century upon the question of baptism in the "United Church" of the future. Some of your older readers remember the warm discussions of this question, which arose in connection with the hope of Christian union, which was awakened by the inter-denominational congresses of a quarter of a century ago. Your position—if I understand it at all—is similar to that of a Baptist brother, whose very definite statement may be found in the files of the Century Magazine, Vol. XII. p. 474. He sums up his argument for union on the basis of immersion-baptism in this concrete statement: "All are agreed on immersion as baptism; all cannot agree on anything else. All can be baptized without doing violence either to conviction or to conscience."

His argument was of course promptly challenged by writers of other denominations. A Presbyterian says, in the same volume of the magazine, page 956, "Notwithstanding all that this Baptist writer says, we do not 'agree on immersion as baptism' for ourselves; and we cannot be immersed 'without doing violence either to conviction or to conscience.' "

The question I wish to ask is this: Does the statement of this Baptist writer express the position of The Christian Century, and, if so, what assurance have you that the rest of the Christian world has changed so much in these twenty-five years that it would adopt our practice, without doing violence to conviction and to conscience and to a good many other things?

A CHRISTIAN CENTURY READER.

(The position taken by The Christian Century has nothing at all in common with the statement of the Baptist writer referred to. He is stating the well-known position of the Baptist church on baptism. He says:

"Christian union, both essential and organic, is greatly retarded because many Christians refuse to accept the plain teachings of God's word, and the conclusion of the highest scholarship regarding the subjects and the act of baptism. Baptists hold that Christ alone can make laws for his church; and that the Bible is the only rule of faith and practice. They believe that this word teaches with unmistakable clearness that believers are the only subjects of baptism, and that baptism is the immersion of believers into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. * * * If scholarship can prove anything, it has established the Baptist position regarding the subject and the act of baptism."

Of course a Presbyterian of only moderate intelligence would take offense at such a statement. It is simply not true that the scholarship of the world supports the Baptist position on baptism. Some scholars support it, others do not. The majority, probably, do not. Certainly the greatest names in theological scholarship are not found on the Baptist side.

The Baptist position as a basis of union is just as hopeless as the optionist position. There is no likelihood of union being accomplished through an agreement of "scholarship" or even through an agreement of all Christian people on the question of baptism or any other question involving our interpretation of specific texts of Scripture. Who knows how long such an agreement would last? Tomorrow we might disagree again—and divide again. No dogma whatsoever, no matter how completely the church can agree upon it, is a basis for Christian union. In the realm of truth the united church will make room for far greater diversity of views than many of us dream.

The Disciples' position differs from that taken by the Baptists as set forth in the quotation above.

A true Disciple would not say the Presbyterians, for example, "refuse to accept the plain teachings of God's word." He leaves that sort of talk to the Baptists, who have been in the theological embroglio three hundred years. But he, the Disciple, has withdrawn from this embroglio. He says to those who are still in it: "Brethren it is wrong for you to divide the body of Christ because you do not agree on the meaning of a text or a group of texts of Scripture. Great interests of the kingdom of God are jeopardized by your division. There is no likelihood of a settlement of your differences in the near future. But they can be overcome if you will accept each other freely as brethren and strive henceforth to practice those things that make for unity and refuse to practice those things that divide."

The fundamental principle with the Disciple is that Baptist and optionist are already equally Christian, members of the Church of Christ, and that they should fellowship each other as such without limitation of any sort. In a word the Disciple pleads for the immediate practice of Christian union among all Christians, and has taken a position outside of denominationalism where, if he is consistent with his ideals, he is already practicing it himself by receiving into his fellowship all whom Christ has received into his.

This position of the Disciples is also The Christian Century's position. We do not see how, standing on a platform like that, we could limit our fellowship to those who happen to understand the baptism texts in a certain way. Nor yet do we see how we could practice sprinkling or pouring in initiating converts into the fellowship (even though we might personally give it preference) when we know that such practice would again divide Christ's church. We must apologize to our readers who have opinions to express, for using so much of the space set apart to them for an expression of our own.—THE EDITORS.)

A British Opinion

(A reader asks us to print on Our Readers' Opinions page the following query and reply clipped from Professor David Smith's correspondence column in The British Weekly.—Editors.)

"I have been reading lately a religious work, and the author makes light of Infant Baptism; and yet how many thousands of Christians have lived and died who never had the Sacrament administered to them in any other way! I would feel thankful if you would give me your views on the subject."

I am sorry that I cannot. I have my own opinion, and I hold it very strongly, and will gladly try to show you, and others who have written me in a like strain, the beauty and grace which I recognize in the Sacrament according to the administration practised in my own communion and, as I believe, approved by the Scriptures and the usage of the Primitive Church. But I must not. We are concerned in this column, not with denominationalism, but with evangelical Christianity, and it would be an abuse of my office if I pronounced on questions which are reasonably disputed among evangelical Christians. The administration of the Sacrament of Baptism belongs to this category.

I have my own opinion, and I would like all my brethren to share it, and enjoy the comfort which it affords me; at the same time, I recognize that many whom I highly esteem think otherwise, and believe that their practice is according to the Word; and it were ill done of me to offend their convictions, especially since they have no right of reply. I am free to protest against whatever seems to me contrary to the spirit of the Gospel, but this is another matter. I wish I could recommend a book to you and others who have written to me on this subject, but I know none that I like. It seems as though men cannot deal with this question without getting controversial, and controversy is so stupid and so un-Christian.

There is always something to be said on both sides of every question, and you settle nothing by scoring a dialectical advantage over your opponent. You do not convince him; you simply irritate him, and gratify your own bellicose propensities. It is a wise rule never to argue, for it is a deplorable loss of time and too often of temper as well. State your view courteously and reasonably, and refuse to be entangled in disputation. Controversy should never be suffered to intrude into Christian teaching. It is not by disputing about it that an evangelical doctrine is enforced and commended, but by displaying its deep significance, its graciousness, its reasonableness, its congruity with the spirit of the Gospel, and its suitability to the needs of the human heart.

I was greatly pleased by a letter I got during my ministry at Blairgowrie from an English gentleman who had worshipped with us in our beautiful church one bright Sunday. It chanced that the Sacrament of Baptism was administered at the forenoon service, and he told me that the beauty of the celebration had appealed to him, and almost persuaded him that our mode was right—an effect which no arguments had ever produced in his mind. It is thus that Christian truth prevails. It does not require argument. It has only to be exhibited in its sweetness and grace, and it commends itself. I wish there were a book on Baptism, conceived and written in this spirit; and I am sometimes disposed to make the attempt and prepare one after the style of my little book on the Communion, "The Pilgrim's Hospice."

One thing I am quite sure of—that the mode of Baptism is not a question which should divide Christians; else the New Testament would have defined it so explicitly that there would be no possibility of divergence in opinion. The one basis of Christian fellowship is loyalty to the Lord Jesus. Did not St. Paul pronounce a benediction on "all them who love Him in sincerity?" This is the only test. It is a test which excludes no one who should be admitted, and admits no one who should be excluded; and the Church should be catholic enough to permit diversity of opinion and practice in all matters of administration. I wonder what the Lord Jesus thinks of our disputings and contendings—so many denominations all disowning one another, yet all owning Him and all owned of Him. It seems to me, that nothing justifies separation between Christians which does not involve separation from Christ.

My quotation today is from Darwin: "I rejoice that I have avoided controversies, and this I owe to Lyell, who many years ago, in reference to my geological works, strongly advised me never to get entangled in a controversy, as it rarely did any good, and caused a miserable waste of time and temper."

DAVID SMITH.

Thanksgiving

BY MRS. A. E. THOMSON.

For blue skies and the dewy morn,
For sheaves of wheat and ripened corn,
For all the fruits that summer yields,
For autumn tints on trees and fields,
For stillness in the hazy hills,
For gusty showers and dashing rills,
Thy name I praise.

For joy in friendly neighbor's call,
For firelight on the dusky wall,
For cushioned chair with thoughts of rest,
For those I know and love the best,
For home, the center of my thought,
For all that tender love hath wrought,
Thy name I praise.

For strength to meet the work of life,
For peace of heart mid stress and strife,
For faith to conquer doubts and fears,
For hope that glorifies the years,
For God above and his dear Son,
For length of life and battles won,
Thy name I praise.

Florie's Pansies.

BY D. C. KAUFFMAN.

Florence Kingsley was nearly fifteen years of age, when her father's business became so poor that it demanded the strictest economy both at the store and in the home. She had heard a great deal about panics and business failures but, like the average girl, paid little or no attention to them. The changes, which are usually made necessary in the management of the home by such conditions were forcibly brought to her notice, however, by the new system of economy in the household and the cutting off of her weekly allowance.

She was very proud of the fact that she was the only one of the children, who received an allowance. This was given to encourage her because she was ever ready and willing to help about the home, and to spur the other children to efforts of greater usefulness, for they were also promised an allowance, when they would become as useful to their mother as Florie was. Therefore, it cost "Daddy" Kingsley many a pang to tell her the real condition of affairs and that he would have to cut off her allowance, for the present at least. She received the news with her usual smile, as she put her arms around his neck and kissed him. With an "alright, Dad," she went about her work as if nothing unusual had happened, but later in the day she managed to get off by herself and have a good cry.

This occurred on Saturday. Sunday morning brought a more vivid realization of the situation, for then she found herself reduced to the usual children's penny, both for church and Sunday school. This was the last straw and it was with anything but a Christian feeling that she spent the rest of the day, but she tried to put on a bold front for her father's sake, whom she dearly loved, and would not, for the world, do or say anything that would cause him a moment's pain.

In spite of every endeavor on her part, the next two days were gloomy ones for her. She knew her dear old "Dad" was watching every movement, and tried her best to keep him from knowing how badly she really felt. Mother always knew, and usually had lots of sympathy and a suggestion or two, but during these days, her whole time was occupied in helping her husband and in planning new economies for the house. So, for the first time in her life, Florie was thrown entirely upon her own resources.

The town in which the Kingsley's lived was not very large, and offered few opportunities for a young girl to improve her cash account. Passing the larger of the two florist's shops, one afternoon, Florie received her first idea as to how she might add to her little store of cash and help lighten the burden now resting upon her father. There were just a few pansy plants in the window, not very fine ones, yet the price was high.

Those little plants unconsciously changed the whole course of her life and showed her how she might surmount untold difficulties and win success, where others would see nothing but failure. Florie seemed to be endowed with a natural gift for raising flowers. They would grow and blossom for her when no one else could do anything with them. Pansies were her favorites, and the little bed she had in the front yard was the envy of all her girl friends.

She was a most generous hearted girl and always gave what she could of her flowers to decorate the church on Sundays or to send to the sick. Of late, however, her plants had been sadly neglected. Her duties at school and at home had taken so much of her time that she just had to give them up, but those few plants in the shop window set her to thinking. The result was a hurried search for old aprons and misplaced garden tools. A great improvement was soon noticed in her flower beds.

About a week later, she visited the florist's. The result must have been satisfactory, for brother Jack and his express wagon were immediately impressed into service, evidently to the young gentleman's entire satisfaction, judging from the manner in which he set to work.

The first load was small but, as the days went by, they increased in size until the florist could use no more. The church continued to receive its full quota and the sick were never once neglected.

It was not long until Florie began to use a little blank book in which to keep her accounts. Her mother watched her from the corner of her eye, while more than once, she and "Daddy" might have been seen smiling as a very tired and soiled little girl bid them good night at unusually good hours.

So far as Jack was concerned, he had to let baseball and every thing else go by, for he was kept busy making long trips to the railroad station with a very much overloaded wagon.

All through vacation time, Florie was kept hard at work. She added a few geraniums and other simple plants to her stock, but the pansy continued to be her mainstay. At the end of the season, she was enabled to joyfully announce that she had earned nearly half of her tuition and other expenses at the Academy, where she had hoped to go for so long.

Strange to say, however, she did not go. She became so much interested in her work that, after a long talk with her parents, she decided to go where she could get a thorough training in flora-culture. The cost would be less and right along the line of work she so dearly loved. Her father surprised her by offering to loan her the balance of the money needed to complete her course, for his business had wonderfully picked up during the summer, although Florie had been too busy to notice it.

She studied hard all of that winter. The next spring, she was again at her beds, improving and enlarging them. Her fame grew with her flowers, until she could not wish for a better or more profitable business.

Jean's Turkey Doll

Jean always had the queerest dolls you ever saw. There was Tom, whose head was a big hickory-nut stuck on a stick; John, who was once a little pine-burr; Sally, whose green face showed her to have been a small watermelon; and her twin sister Susy, whose yellow face proved her to have grown as a little yellow squash. Besides these, there was red-headed Teddy, the bright plaid shawl, whose red fringe answered for hair; Chloe, the brown cloak, and Chibbie, dearest, the yellow one.

Yet Jean wanted more. She dressed up Toddlekins, the cat, and Bright-eyes, the dog; but they hated clothes, and would not lie in a cradle. Then she tried Biddy, the hen; but she pecked and squawked. Jean was looking for a new child when, one Saturday night, her papa brought home a large turkey, ready to be cooked the next day. In the morning mama and papa went to church, leaving Jean with the servant girl, who soon strayed off to speak to the next-door girl.

Jean at once ran down stairs, took the turkey from the cellar, and tugged it up the stairs to her room. She opened her bureau drawer and threw everything out, hunting for a dress for her turkey child. Her best new red silk frock was just the thing; so over the turkey's head she put it, pulled the two legs through the sleeves, and there was the baby all dressed. Then she sat and rocked it, forgetting everything in her joy at having a big new doll.

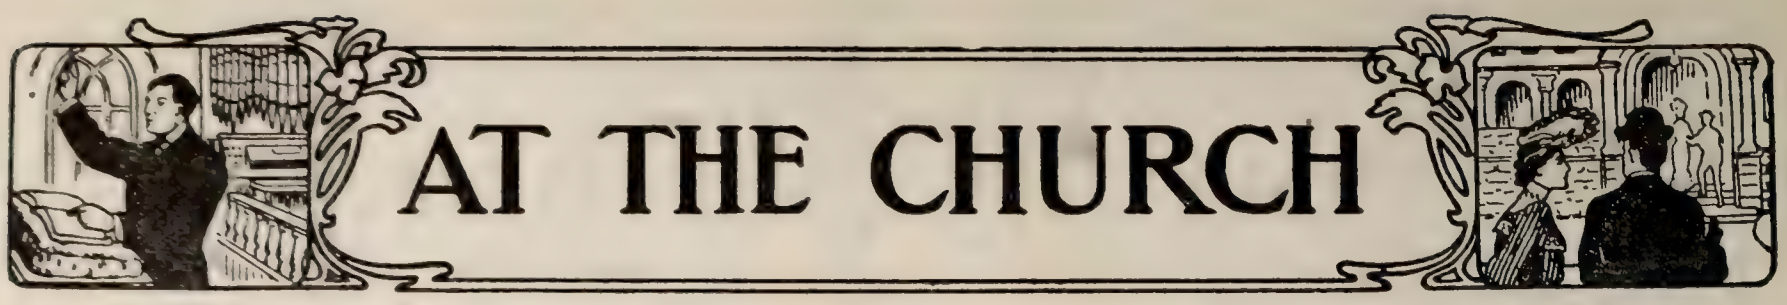
When her father and mother returned they found Katie looking everywhere for the turkey to cook. Up and down they looked, but at last decided that it had been stolen. Mamma went upstairs to take off her bonnet, when what should she see but Jean in her little rocker, with the turkey held closely to her, while all around were the other dolls? Then Jean had to give up her baby to be cooked for dinner. Wasn't that sad?—Our Little Ones.

Let Us Be Thankful

That we live in "God's country."

That church bells ring over all the land.

That the list of benevolent and philanthropic institutions is lengthening in all the cities.



That there never before was such a war on disease and pain.

That our doctors are hunting all the germs out of their hiding places.

That our surgeons can take men apart and put them together again.

That our newspapers, periodicals and books are telling us how to live right.

That we are not tempted by low prices to eat too much.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Three-fold Denial of Peter*

Perhaps there is no place in the ministry of Jesus at which the human and variable characters of the disciples more truly appear than at the time of Jesus' arrest, trial and death. He had carefully chosen these men from the large group that followed him with admiration, and he has every reason to count upon their affection and loyalty.

Yet their faith was only superficial as yet. They had not been tested by the real strain of suffering as they were yet to be. But they were the best men Jesus could find, and in the end it was proved that he had made no mistake in his choice.

Of all these men by far the most interesting was Simon Peter. He was not the greatest of the apostles, for he had less intellectual power than Paul and less intuitive grasp of the truth than John. He was more impulsive than Thomas and not so brave as James. But of all the disciples he proves the most interesting to us, perhaps because we have so much in common with him. He manifested throughout his acquaintance with Jesus the qualities of an immature but growing mind. He was always asking questions, and these questions were not always worth the asking. He was vibrant in disposition, going from one extreme to another rapidly and without reflection. The story of his life abundantly illustrates these statements.

The Testing of Peter.

Perhaps for this very reason Simon Peter was one of the best of witnesses for the life of Jesus. There was nothing of reserve or caution in his nature. He was full of impulse, and was not restrained by any considerations save those of the immediate moment. More than once Jesus had told him that he needed and would receive such testing and sifting of nature as ought to prove valuable, and that after an experience of this kind he should be able to strengthen his brethren. Surely the events of Passion Week were enough to put any man's loyalty to the test. And though Peter's conduct during these trying times left much to be desired in the way of courage and efficiency, yet he was shown to be faithful in spite of all his mistakes, and loyal to the point of rashness when occasion demanded.

During the evening that Jesus spent with his disciples in the upper room he had warned them of approaching troubles. In the words of a prophet of the past, he had told them that the smiting of their shepherd would be the signal for their own dispersion; but that later on he would meet them in the familiar places in Galilee. They could not understand such language. It seemed to them that they were rather on the point of reaching their most sanguine expectations than of meeting defeat and dispersion.

Peter's Promise.

Particularly was Peter of this mind. And he boldly asserted that even if all the others should forsake the Master, he never would. Perhaps it was this immature and unreckoning confidence that made Peter all the more attractive and lovable to the Lord. Certainly there was no reservation on his part when he made this promise. But he little dreamed of the shadows through which they were all to pass so soon. Most of all was he scandalized when Jesus told him that before morning he would himself deny the Master he loved. This was so incredible that the impulsive disciple affirmed that nothing on earth, not even death itself, should tempt him to such disloyalty. Indeed, all the disciples felt the same.

But as the night wore on, they encountered events stranger than any that imagination could picture. They were dimly conscious of the struggle through which Jesus passed under the bending olive trees in the garden of Gethsamane. But the depth of his agony they could not fathom until he told them something more of its meaning when he talked with them in later and better days. From this passive and half sleeping condition in which they waited for their Master near the garden gate, they were suddenly aroused by the glare of the torches in the darkness, and sprung to their feet to confront Judas the traitor, as he brought onward his band of temple guards to arrest the Lord.

The Sudden Fear.

It seems to us who live at this remove of time and place from the scene of that betrayal that nothing could so have terrified the friends of Jesus as to render them powerless in that hour of his deepest need. Robert Browning has expressed the question and the answer in his picture of the aged John in Ephesus, talking with his disciples and meeting their inquiry regarding that sad night.

" 'Forsake the Christ thou sawest transfigured, Him
Who trod the sea and brought the dead to life?
What should wring this from thee?'—ye laugh and ask.
What wrung it? Even a torchlight and a noise,
The sudden Roman faces, violent hands,
And fear of what the Jews might do! Just that,
And it is written, 'I forsook and fled.' "

It was even so with Simon Peter. To be sure there was a momentary flash of courage when he seized a sword from the hands of one of the guards and struck at a servant of the high priest, wounding him in the head. But this spark of courage was soon extinguished, and he, like the rest, took refuge in flight. Through the by-ways of Jerusalem those disciples wandered toward the priestly palace wavering between fear for themselves and intense anxiety to know what befell their Master.

The Gospel of Peter.

When Jesus was taken to the house of Joseph Caiaphas, the high priest, Peter and others of the group crept in quietly and mingled with the crowd that thronged the court. A house is still shown in Jerusalem which tradition, probably without warrant, ascribes to the ownership of Caiaphas. In the court around which such houses were built they had kindled a fire, for the night was cold. Here Peter came and stood with the rest of the company.

The picture presented by the Gospel of Mark is very vivid. It reads like the account of an eye witness, and if the tradition that Mark wrote down the things that Peter was accustomed to teach in the Jerusalem church, we can believe that it is to all intents and purposes Peter's Gospel. It is significant that it presents the most lifelike picture of all Gospels regarding this scene of Peter's denial. Nothing is spared of the sad details of that act of disloyalty. Three times over Peter insisted that he had no connection with the Man of Nazareth. Even when they insisted that his very speech was that of a northerner from Galilee he still denied that he knew or was interested in Jesus. And at last with oaths and curses, he swore that he knew nothing of the man.

It was at this point that the dawn began to break. The cocks were crowing on the slopes of Jerusalem The sound brought back to Peter the words of his Master, spoken only a few hours before. He had told him that before the crowing of the cocks announced the morning, he would betray him thrice. Luke adds the significant statement that at this moment Jesus turned and looked upon Peter from the inner apartment where he was guarded. The memory of the Savior's words, still more the pathos of his regretful look, but most of all the dreadful sense of his own denial of the Lord he loved, came back upon him with overwhelming power. And in the agony of that moment which was but the first of many yet to come, he wept over the sin that should blot his name as long as the Gospel story was told.

Progress of Modern Surgery

Modern surgery is making wonderful strides forward as was demonstrated at the clinical meeting of the surgeons of North America held in Chicago last week. Hands and feet from a person who has just died may be transferred to a living man or woman who needs them, medical men were told. Such a remarkable feat is already possible, and will soon become practical through the rapid progress that is being made in arterial surgery. Where arms and legs have been crushed the injured parts can be cut off and the hands and feet, if uninjured, can be reattached. Moreover, enlarged spleens can be taken out and normal spleens substituted. Diseased kidneys can be removed and healthy organs put back in their place. Dr. V. D. Lespinasse discussed the wonderful possibilities of blood-vessel surgery with the aid of metallic magnesium rings, which are absorbed by the tissues in seventy to 100 days, according to the size of the rings. In a great many cases the use of the Lespinasse rings has already passed beyond the experimental stage and has been the means of saving many lives and limbs.

Church Life

—First Sunday in December.

—This is C. W. B. M. Day.

—All live, broad churches will "help those women" on that day.

—One woman in Chicago gave $1,000 at the Disciples' C. W. B. M. rally in connection with the Jubilee celebration two weeks ago. No mention was made of this fact in the excellent report of the Jubilee in last week's issue, due to the modesty of the writer of the report.

—Note the editors' request concerning the Daily Altar and write your sentiments as soon as convenient.

—The near approach of Christmas suggests that there is no better gift to make your friends than to send them The Christian Century for a year.

—Read our remarkable book offers in this issue.

—"Altar Stairs," Judge Scofield's beautiful story, a beautifully bound and illustrated volume—three copies for the price of one —$1.50 and 10 cents for postage.

—We blush to make the offer, but large quantities must be sold by Jan. 1.

—This is the most beautifully bound book that has ever been put out by the New Christian Century Co., or by any Disciple publishing house.

—And Dr. Willett's books, "Our Plea for Union," and "Basic Truths of the Christian Faith," will be sold out in a few weeks at 75 cents each.

—Of course your school will introduce the Bethany Graded Lessons on January 1, if it has not already done so.

—Do not delay another day to send for prospectus and order blank.

—Send your order early so as to avoid the Christmas rush in mail and express.

—The publishers are looking forward to a great increase next quarter in the number of schools using the Bethany Graded Lessons.

—Isn't that an extraordinary opportunity described on page 2? Think of Sunday-school classes—Young People's and Advanced —getting Dr. Willett's great course on "The Moral Leaders of Israel," for $1 per member, and all the good things in The Christian Century thrown in free!

—And Dr. Scott's splendid work on "The Life of Jesus," for those classes which wish to work in the New Testament. Do not fail to read Professor Wakefield's "Introduction," re-printed from the book, on page 2.

—"The Life of Jesus," is adapted to young people of high-school grade as well as to mature minds.

—The Bethany series now supplies the entire school, and there are other good things to be announced in the near future.

J. P. Garmong and L. E. Brown have closed their meeting at Wilmingon, O., with W. S. Houchins, the pastor there during which a good spirit of fellowship was stimulated among the churches of the city. Mr. Garmong is now at Bethany, Mo., assisting the pastor, John Young, in a meeting.

C. W. Ross has closed a meeting at Carlinville, Ill. He was assisted in the singing by Mrs. Ross, and many people were reached through their ministrations. Prospects are bright for a good work there, the Sunday-school having doubled its membership since the beginning of the pastorate of J. W. Porter.

The Sunday-school of First Church, Hutchinson, Kan., has abandoned its old form of organization and adopted the commission form of government. The new plan provides for five, commissioners, specialists along their lines. The departments, which they head are organization, membership, literature, finance and music. The plan was outlined by the minister, O. L. Cook.

A Men's Bible class was organized on Nov. 7th, at Corning, Iowa, where O. W. Winter ministers. A banquet constituted the opening session, and F. J. Murphy of Des Moines and G. W. Maltby of Ottumwa, were present and gave interesting talks. The class starts with thirty-two charter members and plans are under way to increase this number to fifty by January 1.

The Men's Brotherhood of South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo., assumed the expense of the recent evangelistic services conducted by C. L. Organ and C. M. Howe and not only helped financially, but were faithful in their attendance. Such service as this would seem to solve in a measure the much-discussed "purpose" of the Brotherhood. Much good was accomplished in this meeting in every department of the church.

William Oeschger, chancellor of Cotner University, Bethany Neb., is engaged in a campaign for an annual current expense fund of $5,000, for the university. Mr. Oeschger delivered an address at the Bethany church on "Christian Education," Nov. 6, and at the close of the service, the congregation pledged more than five hundred dollars annually for three years toward this fund. More than three hundred students are enrolled, and the affairs of the university are in an encouraging condition.

A three week's meeting closed recently in Colorado Springs, Colo. The pastor, George B. Stewart, was assisted by Geo. L. Snively and Mr. Seniff, and with seventy added to the membership, the church is greatly strengthened. This gives a nominal membership of about eleven hundred. This has been a fruitful year in the history of the church and among the signs of progress are many improvements in the building and equipment, a quadrupled offering for foreign misions, and the Christian Endeavor increased three-fold.

While the common saying, "It pays to advertise," is, in the main true, it is well to qualify this statement when printed publicity of church and religious affairs is considered, for if dignity is sacrificed to flamboyancy, the good of publicity is not only lost, but the whole ideal for which the church stands is lowered. The Christian Century is in receipt of a bulletin published in the interest of the evangelistic services, now being conducted at First Church, Philadelphia, Pa., by Luther E. Sellers, which is a credit both to the church and Mr. Sellers, a good likeness of whom forms the cover. A clear, broad statement of the purpose of the Disciples, and the weekly sermon subjects, make it an attractive means of publicity for the present meeting.

As we are going to press, the Disciple business men of Chicago, are holding a session of intense interest in the heart of the city to raise a thousand dollars to conserve the great work of Dr. Dye, in the Upper Congo country. The appeal of Mrs, Dye at the Topeka convention, has touched the hearts of our Chicago leaders, already peculiarly responsive on account of Dr. Dye's own personal touch upon their lives a year ago. It will be remembered that Chicago gave a thousand dollars then, to enable Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Smith to accompany Dr. Dye. Our readers will have deep interest in hearing the result of the present conference of Chicago men.

Walter Scott Priest has just closed the first year of his service with the Central Church in Wichita, Kansas. In many respects, it has been the best year in the history of that organization. One hundred and twenty names have been added to the roster—quite as many as can readily be assimilated and set to work in various lines. It has been the best year in raising missionary money in the history of the church. In round numbers, $8,000 have been given to missions, benevolences and education. $260 more were given for Foreign missions than last year. The church became a living link in the A. C. M. S., in the Kansas C. M. S.; lots were bought on the west-side where a mission will be started; the north-end mission organized into a church, to which the Central dismissed about 60 members; a $4,000 mortgage debt paid off; the Christian Endeavor sustaining several orphans in India and doing much charitable work through the Sedgwick Home there. The minister is seeking to do constructive, abiding work, endeavoring to have his people see the real vision of the Christ heart and life and manifest the same in their own daily walk. The second year has begun with bright prospects.

American Mission Notes.

The Mission Prayer Cycle topic for November 27th is for "The Board of Trustees at Cincinnati."

The offering made last Sunday, and all the affairs of the American Christian Missionary Society are guided by the Board of Trustees at Cincinnati. These brethren need the prayers of all that they may discharge faithfully the trust which has been imposed upon them. They give their services cheerfully and gratuitously. Let the schools in turn give their co-operation generously and lovingly.

In answer to our query, "Why should our Bible-schools make a generous offering for Home Missions on or about the 20th of November," the answer comes, "Because of the great need of mission work in America." There are thousands of foreign children in the slums of our great cities who have no Sunday-school privileges. There are large sections of our great cities that are scarcely reached by the influence of the church. There are scores of towns and cities all over the United States where the plea of the Disciples of Christ is little known and where we have no organized church.

Our Florida Secretary, T. A. Cox, writes thus of the year just closed: "During the year our State Board workers have preached in 21 different places in the state. They have served at eight places regularly, doing pastoral work. Only one new church was organized, that at Palatka, with 19 members. There have been seven added since the organization. They have built for themselves a small tabernacle and have regular preaching It is the policy of our Board not to organize churches faster than they can be cared for, but to advance as fast as we can hold the ground we gain.

A message from the new church at Kenora, Ont., tells us that they are very busy at present building a church and expect to have B. B. Burton hold a meeting here in January or February. Things are looking up and they have organized a teacher-training class of seven members. They are confident of growth. Norman Brighton is the pastor.

E. O. Sharpe, of Corpus Christi, Texas, says, "Our work is slowly gaining ground. We now have nearly 70 members as against less than 40 six months ago. We are now about to begin the building of a tabernacle which will be neat, substantial and commodious. It will cost completely equippel, about $11.000, and will seat 600 people. We will need at least $500 more to complete the payment on it. The writer released the congregation from paying $300 on salary that they might put that amount in to the building fund. Any one in our great movement who would like to see South Texas won for Christ and New Testament religion, is asked to send a contribution to our tabernacle fund right now."

On Sunday, October 9th, we dedicated a new house of worship in the suburb of St. James, Winnipeg. This gives us a building that will hold about 200 people, and 108 feet of land, valued now at $25.00 a foot. This land was purchased nine months ago for $12.50 a foot, the market price at that time. I want to say that what has been done in the suburb of St. James can, with a little money to make the first payment on the lot,

New Third Church, Indianapolis

The Third Church, Indianapolis, has been making history. In the first place it has begun the building of a new church, which will cost, when completed, about $85,000. In the second place it has changed its location, moving six blocks from its former site.

After selling the old building at Ashland and Thirteenth, the congregation of the Third Church, conducted services for four months in an armory. On the morning of Nov. 6th, the first regular services were held in the new building. Only the first story is ready for occupancy, but the building committee hopes to complete the structure, during the next year.

The New House For Third Church, Indianapol is, (As It is to Look When Completed).

The part now occupied is very complete in its appointments and also very commodious. The foundation is 76x135 feet. The heating plant boiler house and custodians' residence are at the rear of the property.

As the Third Church conducts several institutional features, it is sometimes called the Every-day Church. The first floor comfortably seats 1,000 persons within sight and hearing of the speaker. The men's class for Bible Study has a room set aside for its work. This room will seat 200 men. There is a primary department room that is adequate for 150 little tots. This room is also used as a prayer-meeting room, dining room and day-kindergarten room. There are also thirteen class-rooms, separated by roller partitions, for the Sunday-school. On this floor there are also comfort rooms, a kitchen and cloak room and closets for various purposes. The entire first floor is finished in white, old-ivory and mahogany. In addition to the regular equipment, there are two pianos, one a high-grade grand, and also a fine double stereopticon.

The second story with the balcony, will seat over 1,500. The balcony is to be self-supporting, so that there will be an unobstructed view of the pulpit and platform, from every quarter of the auditorium. The choir gallery will seat sixty singers. The baptistry is to be one of the unique features of the building. It will be integral with the organ arch and the arrangement is acknowledged to be one of the best plans ever seen in a building owned by our people. On the same floor with this auditorium are the choir-rooms, a woman's parlor and buffet kitchen attached, also the pastor's study and an adjoining office for the assistant to the pastor.

The building is of brick and Bedford stone and while devoid of expensive ornamentation it presents a massive and pleasing appearance, with every suggestion of utility and simplicity.

The building is practically paid for, as far as finished and there are pledges to more than cover the balance due on the contracts already let.

The congregation is receiving the congratulations of its friends and the people of our other neighboring churches, with their pastors.

There were eleven additions at the first service held in the new building.

Harry G. Hill is the pastor and Miss May Cunningham and R. W. Lookabill are his worthy lieutenants associated in pastoral work.

The church is a living link in the Home Society and also through the C. W. B. M. Miss Elsie Gordon, being its representative in India.

been in charge for some months. Miss A. D. Allen of Adelaide has rcently joined them. She goes at her own charges.

Sunday, October 16th, found F. M. Rains at Madura, India. G. W. Brown of Jubbulpore, had joined him and they were making their way to our stations in the Central Provinces. He will probably sail from Calcutta, December 6th, and hopes to reach Manila, Philippine Islands, in time to take Christmas dinner with the missionaries in that city.

Money is greatly needed for Dr. C. C. Drummond's hospital at Harda, India. We are hoping that some friend will provide three or four thousand dollars for this purpost in the near future.

Miss Bertha Clawson reached Tokio, Japan, the last of October. The Japanese were greatly rejoiced at her return from her furlough. Some of our Japanese teachers in the girls' school waited at the station with their wives and children four hours to see her. Miss Clawson is greatly beloved by the Japanese.

The annual report of the Foreign society has been issued. It fills one hundred and seventy-five pages. Copies can be ordered from the society.

The Congo steamer, "Oregon," had her trial trip on the 7th of October and did very well.

A. F. Hensey and wife reached Bolenge on the last day of September. The missionaries had arranged a very delightful welcome for them. The first thing that greeted their eyes was a banner with the inscription in large letters, "Welcome Home." All the evangelists had come in that morning so there was a great crowd of native Christians to welcome them also.

The need of two doctors for Africa is very urgent. One is needed for Longa to take Dr. Jaggard's place when he comes home on furlough, and the other at Lotumbe. The people are asking for physicians and the state officials are ready to help support them. Two doctors are indispensable to the enlargement of the work in Africa.

Ashland Ave. (Chicago) Meeting.

One of the best meetings in the history of our people in Chicago is now in progress, being conducted by the Brooks evangelistic company, the services being held at Masonic Hall, 6319 Ashland Ave., under the auspices of the Ashland Christian Church.

We had arranged for these meetings months before the Chapman campaign was inaugurated, hence we were unable to make a union meeting, but we are in the spirit of evangelism that now pervades the city.

We had 21 additions last Sunday, 15 coming forward at the evening service. The very best people of the community are among the converts. Many of our people thought a real revival was impossible in this thickly settled district of the city, but we are witnessing services of such deeply spiritual power that the hardest hearts are being moved.

W. T. Brooks and his associates, Tapp and Lewis, form a combination of evangelists that will succeed in any field. They know how to organize and lead the personal work. They handle the services with skill and power. Sermons and songs articulate perfectly and are characterized with dignity and intense earnestness. It is being demonstrated that the dear old gospel has power to save, and has power to attract, even in Chicago.

We have spent time and money in advertising the revival. Window cards, booklets, large water-color portraits of the evangelists, and special tickets were used for weeks in advance of the Brooks meetings. The people seem ready for the revival and we are expecting a large ingathering. There have been 38 additions to this date, Nov. 14th.

Plain Duty, Too Long Neglected

To the Disciples of Christ, everywhere, Greeting.

The signs of the times, as to the progress of the kingdom of God, throughout the world, are such as to rejoice the hearts of all true followers of our Master and Lord. His name is being heralded throughout the earth, and his truth is permeating human society everywhere. Multitudes of souls are daily being born again into his kingdom of grace, and the hearts of his believing disciples are drawing closer to one another.

The cause of Christian union, for which our fathers plead, and for whose advocacy and practice, we were called into being as a people, is becoming daily more precious to those of every Christian communion, who are being led by the Spirit of Christ. Human names and creeds have lost their power to charm, and to our Savior's will his people are daily becoming more submissive.

It becomes those, who have for a hundred years stood for that liberty, loyalty and love which find their common source and object in Jesus Christ, to welcome every step, however short, and every movement, however imperfect, that looks toward the final goal of Christian union. We ought to be first to rejoice in, and give our aid to, every movement that brings the lovers of our Lord closer together, and enables them to work for common aims, so far as they can without surrender of the truth for which they stand.

Such a movement is that of Christian cooperation, as organized in the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, which met in Philadelphia, two years ago. Into the local church federations, which have grown out of this movement, many of our local congregations have entered heartily, and have found here opportunity to add their power to that of sister churches, in effecting needed reforms in their several communities.

But we have thus far fallen short of our obligation and opportunity, in the support we have given to the national council. Its work of spreading throughout our country, the principles of fellowship embodied in the work of the council, has been hampered by lack of funds. We have not borne our share in it, which we ought gladly to do. The committee appointed by the brethren, who attended the Philadelphia council have not pushed this matter, but have merely stated the need, once or twice, through our papers, and have left the brethren to respond or not, as they might have greater or less interest in the matter.

Our apportionment for the year, 1910, is $1,250.00, based upon our membership of a million and a quarter. Surely this is not too much? In view of the high interests involved, and our professed zeal for Christian union, we can certainly spend this small sum annually in cultivating closer fellowship with those, whom we are pleading with to unite upon New Testament ground. The following pledges have been made for the year 1910, some of which have already been paid.

Frank H. Main, New York City	$25.00
R. A. Long, Kansas City, Mo.	50.00
E. M. Bowman, Chicago	25.00
Fletcher Cowherd, Kansas Ctiy, Mo.	7.50
W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Mo.	10.00
D. D. and S. R. Clough, Plainview, Minn.	10.00
J. Irvin Bitner, Hagerstown, Md.	10.00
Claire L. Waite, Milwaukee, Wis.	5.00
W. M. Mayfield, Butler, Mo.	2.50
Mrs. Fay Finkle, Galva, Kas.	1.00
Total	$146.00

Will not every minister, whose heart is with this cause, send a pledge of five or ten dollars at once to the undersigned? And will not Christian business men, who read this statement respond with such contribution as they may be able to give? Let small offerings be made by those who are unable to give

in the
Cure of Indigestion

The Science of Human Electricity proves that Digestion is purely an Electrical Process.

The peristaltic Action (contraction and expansion) of the stomach necessary to keep the food from fermentation, is due to the presence of Electricity in that organ. Again, the attraction from the blood of the elements which form the Gastric fluids for dissolving it, is an electrical process and does not exist when this power is not present.

When for any reason one is weakened, the normal amount of Electricity is not flowing to the stomach; also when one overworks he uses in the brain or muscles the Electricity which is needed in the Stomach for the thorough digestion of his food. A lack of this power in the Stomach means an inactive conditiontion of that organ, and this inactivity results in fermentation of the food—or indigestion. There is thus a great decrease in the supply of building material or nourishment for the body, a large falling off in the production of Electrical Energy and the circulation of the blood and life processes of the whole organism are interfered with.

Andrew McConnell has discovered the Electrical Laws for drawing the Electricity already in the body to the stomach during the process of digestion. These are self-treatments which anyone can give himself and which result in perfect digestion even when the best specialist fail to give help.

Dieting is by no means a cure, because the best food combinations require SOME power for their digestion, and when, as is the case in a weakened condition, insufficient Electricity is supplied no method of dieting or drugs can effect a cure. There is enough Electricity in the body, even when one is in the most weakened state, to digest ordinary food if drawn to the stomach. This system of self-cure removes the necessity for dieting and every one can, through utilizing the Electricity already in the body, cure Indigestion and consequently the diseases which follow in its train; Constipation, Insomnia, Rheumatism, Heart Weakness, Nervous Exhaustion, Catarrh, etc.

Send for literature which proves that one can cure himself of the various forms of disease.

Ohio Secretary's Letter

The Ohio churches are busy with the fall campaign. Along evangelistic lines a few of the activities are noted below:

N. T. Sims closed a short meeting with the Dennis church in Knox County with seven baptisms. He begins at Blandensburg at once.

J. P. Allison held a meeting with the church at Tappan in October. There were thirteen additions at Tappan and there were nineteen added to his own church at Dunham Ave., Cleveland during the same month. October closed five years of his ministry at Dunham Ave., during which time there were 300 added to the church.

C. A. MacDonald, Bible School specialist was with the church at Mentor in a three weeks' evangelistic campaign in which a number were added to the church membership. He is at present in a week's Bible School campaign at Mansfield. Following this he will be with the church at Massillon three weeks.

G. H. Sims is assisting C. C. Maple and the church at Medina in a meeting. Miss Sylvia Keener is leader of song. There have been seven additions at last information.

F. E. Spooner held a two weeks' meeting at Mt. Olivet with twelve additions. He began Nov. 9th at Augusta.

T. J. White, our Southern Ohio Evangelist, is holding a meeting at Hemlock to rejuvinate the church. The meeting is doing great good and will leave a greatly encouraged and strengthened congregation. He will assist J. A. Armstrong at Felicity in November.

The eight churches of Holmes County begin a simultaneous revival Nov. 13th.

W. S. Houchins is having the assistance of J. P. Garmong in a meeting at the Walnut St. Church Wilmington.

J. C. B. Stivers of Cleveland held a good meeting with the church at Sparta in October.

J. M. VanHorn is with the Second Church, Warren assisting C. O. Reynard in the work there.

Things are happening in Sunday-school lines in Ohio. Steubenville and Dayton Central held rallies with the biggest attendance ever. A. F. Stahl secured 787 at Steubenville. John P. Sala had an attendance of 812 at Dayton.

M. L. Buckley has brought the Collinwood Sunday-school to be the largest among our schools in Cleveland and vincinity.

The school at Canton is planning a great Sunday-school institute for the first of the year. Hiram and Bethany will be in attendance for the instruction.

Among the interesting items concerning our mission churches in Ohio it might be noted that the church at Norwalk is building a $6,000 house on their fine lot recently purchased. These people are working bravely.

L. A. Warren is getting started in his new work with our Clyde C. E. Mission.

J. Wesley Hatcher came from West Liberty, Ky. to minister to our West Dayton mission the first of November. The outlook for this important work is good.

W. G. Loucks is having an average Bible School attendance of 224 at the South Akron mission.

L. I. Mercer, our State Bible School evangelist, held a meeting of three weeks with the band of Disciples at Sidney. He was assisted by Sam W. Crabtree as leader of song and left a church of 42 members with money raised for the support of a minister. E. B. Kemm of Piqua had fostered this work for a year before the visit of Brother Mercer.

C. G. Baker of Plymouth, Ind., formerly minister at New Paris and Campbellstown, was married to Mrs. Olive Billman at the residence of the bride's parents at New Paris, Nov. 3rd. The state secretary officiated.

Now concerning the collection. These lines are penned in the first hours after Ohio Day, but the returns thus far are most encouraging. The society has just received a personal gift of $100 for special work, from a long time friend of our work.

The First Church, Akron, George Darsie minister, gives the largest offering in its history, more than $400.

The church at Mansfield under the leadership of Chas. R. Oakley has already quadrupled the offering of last year and is going right on for still greater things.

Dunham Ave. Church, Cleveland will give $50.

Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland becomes a "Living Link."

Mt. Olivet doubles last year's offering.

Kenton, Ashland and Mowrystown make substantial increase over last year.

N. T. Sims closed his meeting with the Dennis church by raising an offering of $10 for Ohio Missions. Last year the church gave nothing. He begins the meeting at Bladensburg with an offering to the state work.

Under the leadership of T. J. White, our Southern Ohio evangelist, the Hemlock church gave $17.68. This is the first missionary offering the church ever gave.

Dayton Central gives $250. If these early returns are indicative they mean an increased income from the churches this year. It is high time our state was receiving greatly enlarged revenues. There are many opportunities and many calls for help.

See that your church joins the procession and makes a generous offering. Send the money promptly.

David W. Teachout, son of the president of our Board of Managers, has done valuable and fruitful service for the offering, by holding a series of rallies in practically all of the

Your Friend-- The Christian Century

When you think of your friends to whom you wish to make Christmas presents, do not forget your constant and intimate friend—The Christian Century.

We feel so secure in your affection that we make bold to suggest what gift would please us most. We do not ask you to buy anything for us. But if you would devote a little of your time and get a list of new subscriptions to The Christian Century it would please us more than any other thing.

And this is a gift in which we could reciprocate. Your own paper would be more valuable to you; and your friends whose subscriptions you received—think how they would be benefitted throughout the year!

Christmas time offers an ideal opportunity for all the friends of The Christian Century who have on many occasions expressed their appreciation in words to express it in a practical deed. You can help make a greater paper, if you will.

Begin to talk with your friends now.

If you send a list of five or more you may have a good commission on each new subscription, if you wish it.

I. J. CAHILL, Cor. Sec'y.

From Dr. Dye

Dear Friends and Fellow-workers:—Again our hearts were rejoiced by the coming of the ever increasing throng of people coming with the brave evangelistic force, from their three months' trip among the far distant villages. This time there were at least 150, who came back and as the long file wound itself down the station streets and to our houses to greet us, it thrilled our hearts afresh with the joy of the reaper, who going forth to reap, comes bringing precious sheaves with him.

Possibly a few incidents of this remarkable concourse's journey would interest you. Starting from across the Boloko river, the little group came to the big village of Ntaka. Here they were held up, "We won't let you pass till you promise that when you return, you will bring us teachers. We have been passed by long enough. If this teaching is true it means us. See here is a house and here is a drum (to use as a bell) to call us together with and here is a boat for your use. We demand our teacher." And not until the men had promised they would try to bring their own teacher, would they consent to their passing. One of our brave men, Bitumba, went over and staid a week, with meetings averaging from 500 to 900 attendance.

Crossing the river they came on to Isaka and there were joined by the contingent from there and then on to Englewood station, (Englewood, Chicago) and here 54 joined them besides the evangelists and Christians, and thus singing they came on. Arriving at one hostile village, through which they wished to pass, they were met by an armed force of savages, daring them to come on and threatening murder. The men took counsel and prayed and then lifting their voices in a song they started on. (It was "Onward, Christian Soldiers.") Such was the superstitious awe, aroused by this exhibition of faith, that the crowd dispersed and they passed through unmolested. On, mile after mile, they came, here a little group joining them and ever preaching and singing, they marched through the swamps and forest paths, villages that had been before indifferent, now welcomed them heartily and bade them stay longer, but no, they would not be delayed for they were hurrying to get in in time to meet and welcome two more of their loved teachers, Brother and Sister Hensey, who were expected on Friday morning. So on they hastened. A woman, who had come with her husband, the long hard journey, to learn more of this wonderful Saviour, gave birth to a boy baby. They slept in that village that night and came on with a forced march the next day, arriving here at 8 a. m. Passing through the village that had attacked them (at the instigation of a Catholic Catechist) they were surprised to receive a kindly welcome and to have two strong men, stand out and say, "Well if that religion of yours teaches such things, we too want to know more of it." The chief declared, "We have been deceived by these Catholics and we want the true teaching of God. Thus the call echoes and re-echoes down to you friends. "Send us teachers of the Truth." Hasten! "The Son of God goes forth to war. Who follows in His train?"

Yours in His glad service,

ROYAL J. DYE.

With a New Perfection Oil Heater

When clothes can't be hung outside, and must be dried in a room or cellar, the New Perfection Oil Heater quickly does the work of sun and air. You can hang up the wet clothes, light your Perfection Oil Heater, open the damper top, and the heat rises and quickly dries the clothes.

Do not put off washing to await a sunny day in order to avoid mildew. Dry your washing any day with hot air from a

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

It gives just as much heat as you desire. It is safe, odorless and smokeless.

It has an automatic-locking flame spreader, which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back, so the wick can be quickly cleaned. Burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, because of a new device in construction, and can always be easily unscrewed for rewicking.

An indicator shows the amount of oil in the font. Filler-cap does not need to be screwed down, but is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached to the font by a chain. You will wish to remember the families of your congregation or the pupils of your school or class at Christmas time. There is no token so appropriate as a tasteful, simple card with a gracious Christmas greeting on it. We have prepared this for you. The sentiment is printed in Two Colors on a heavy paper folder enclosed in a white envelope of fine quality.

A CHRISTMAS GREETING

DEAR FRIENDS: Once more the whole round world gathers about the Manger-Cradle in Bethlehem. How wonderful that the Saviour of the world came as a Child into a human home. How full of wonder the words: "Unto us a Child is born!" Childhood is forever more significant, motherhood more sacred, the Home itself a brighter center of Life and Love.

On this good Christmas Day let us rededicate our homes to Him; let us resolve to lead the children in His Way; let us give the Bible its true place in the household; let us magnify love and friendship and service; let us cherish His Church and Kingdom; and let us bind all the influences of our lives about His feet

If this Greeting shall come to any who are sick, or burdened, or troubled, or absent from home, let it speak to every anxious heart of Christ's Peace

To one and all of you, and to all whom you hold dear, I send my heart's Greeting in His Name. May your portion of the Christmas Joy be truly plentiful—enough for you and for others beside

THE LIFE OF JESUS
In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT

This Book Is Now In Press

It comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

Following is Professor Wakefield's Introduction to Dr. Scott's volume:

"Dr. Loa E. Scott has had long experience in school life, in college and university. She has been both student and teacher. She felt early and deeply that there was serious lack in the teaching of the Sunday-school. Poor provision was made for minds that were mature and purposeful; there was lack of such continuity as leads to definite and satisfactory results.

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"She is plainly doing a work that is called for in many and many a community. And if her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world." E. B. WAKEFIELD.

THE MORAL LEADERS OF ISRAEL
In Fifty-two Lessons

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Appearing Weekly in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.

For many years Dr. Willett's department treating of the International Uniform lessons has been one of the leading features of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. For 1911 there will be two important changes in this department.

1. Instead of following the Uniform lessons which are rapidly being abandoned by the best schools in favor of the Graded series, Dr. Willett will coöperate with the publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons in producing a course for young people's and adult classes, on constructive lines, in the field of Old Testament Prophecy. There is intense human interest today in those ancient prophets—the moral leaders of Israel.

The international Uniform lessons for next year deal with the same studies. While Dr. Willett's arrangement of the material will differ from that of the Uniform lessons, there will be many points at which the two series will be tangent to each other. Both the similarity and difference between the two courses will give added interest to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY course in schools where the Uniform lessons are used in whole or in part.

2. The other change in Dr. Willett's department is that while in the past the lessons have been prepared mainly as an aid to teachers, in the coming year they will be prepared for both pupils and teacher. Instead of the plain narrative form there will be variety of treatment, the use of questions and other pedagogical devices for giving point to each lesson. Dr. Willett will bring into use that well-known teaching gift which makes his university class room so constantly popular.

The publishers of The Christian Century propose to supply classes of six or more with weekly copies of the paper at $1 per year for each copy, or 30 cents per quarter. This, when one thinks of it, is an extraordinary offer. The class members will receive in addition to their Sunday-school lesson all the rich things provided every week in The Christian Century. The papers distributed to the class on Sunday will contain the lesson for the following Sunday.

Send your order through the regular Sunday-school Treasurer if you wish to pay quarterly; or deal directly with the Publishers, enclosing remittance at the rate of $1.00 per year for each copy ordered. Be sure and give name of teacher or class member to whom papers shall be sent for distribution.

In making plans for the New Year let all pastors and teachers and members of Bible classes, who read this announcement, bring it to the attention of their classes and arrange at once to be supplied with THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY and THE LIFE OF JESUS, for the first Sunday in January.

Mr. Lloyd George a Disciple

A Baptist paper reports the baptism of the daughter of Mr. Lloyd George, Chancellor of the British Exchequer. The paper says Mr. George is a Baptist and leaves the reader to infer that the young woman's baptism was administered in a Baptist church. This is a mistake. Mr. Lloyd George affiliates with the Baptists in London, but his membership is held in a Disciples' church at his home in Wales. Our English correspondent, Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, sends to The Christian Century a clipping from the London Daily News, giving the report of the baptism to the Chancellor's daughter. The account is as follows:

There was a crowded congregation at the Berea Disciples' Church, Criccieth, on Sunday night, when five young people, including Miss Lloyd George, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's daughter, were admitted into membership by baptism. The opening part of the service was conducted by Mr. Williams, and the Scriptural lesson was read by Mr. Lloyd George. The rite of baptism by immersion was administered by Mr. Richard Lloyd, the Chancellor's uncle, who has, with Mr. William Williams, been joint pastor of Berea for fifty-two years.

The two aged "pastors" are no doubt the teaching elders of the congregation, holding their office according to the custom of the "older brethren" of Great Britain, after whose order the Berea church is probably constituted.

Theodore Parker

Last week a series of special gatherings in the city celebrated the anniversaries of Theodore Parker, the eminent thinker and preacher of Boston a half century ago. There was assembled in this city a conspicious company of leaders in liberal religious thought in honor of the event. Meetings were held in several different halls, and in a number of the churches appreciative reference was made to the influence of Parker upon religious and social thought in America. The climax of the celebration was reached on Thursday evening at a banquet held at the Auditorium, at which time about five hundred people, representing many different organizations and interests, listened to addresses from President Hamilton of Tufts College, Judge Mack of Chicago, Miss Jane Addams of Hull House, Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, Superintendent of Public Schools in Chicago, Mr. Edwin D. Mead of Boston, Mr. Charles F. Dole, president of the Nineteenth Century Club and Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Abraham Lincoln Centre, Chicago, who had been chiefly instrumental in organizing the celebration.

Theodore Parker was one of the first men in America to recognize the essential unity of religious interests. His breadth of view and disinclination to concern himself with the theological discussions of the times made him a feared and often hated figure. There were many who thought that the name, Theodore Parker was capable of definition by any of the opprobrious epithets which are reserved in our day for the billingsgate of uninformed and hot-tempered doctrinal animosity. But for the most part the views held by Theodore Parker have become the commonplaces of religious thinking in our time. He can be claimed by the Unitarians only in the very general sense that he happened to find Unitarnism the freest atmosphere in his time. But his spirit differed totally from that of an extreme Unitarianism, such as Minot J. Savage would represent today.

It is an interesting fact that Theodore Parker made frequent use of the phrase afterwards so masterfully employed by Lincoln in his Gettysburg speech: "A government of the people, for the people and by the people." Yet it is doubtful if it can be proved that Lincoln derived the phrase from Parker, for it was much older than Parker is today.

That theological misunderstandings have not faded from the earth, is proved by the fact that several ministers to whom the invitation to attend the meetings in connection with the Parker Memorial was sent, responded with acerbity, asserting that Parker was the outspoken enemy of orthodox religion in his time, and they wanted no part in doing honor to his name. But this spirit of belated hatred is disappearing from the earth. Parker was by no means the greatest man of his generation, as some of his over-zealous panegyrists would have us believe, but he rendered valiant service in the cause of religious liberty and of social progress.

The Goodness of Jehovah

A recent suicide left as the explanation of his deed the question, "What's the use?" He was a well-equipped physician and had before him a life filled with opportunities of service to the suffering. But he had no faith in God or man. His conclusion that life was not worth while was a natural one. Of the same mind was the mediaeval philosopher who wrote: "I live, but I know not how long; I die, but I know not when; I depart, but I know not whither. How is it posible for me to fancy myself happy?" The baser souls that have no faith say, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die."

The psalmist of Israel knew the meaning of disappointment and misery. His race was the scorn of the world. It had endured all that brute force and greed could inflict upon a subject people. But the psalmist thought it was worth while to live. The goodness of Jehovah was so real to him that no experience, however bitter, could take from him the love of life. The arrogance of foes was merely another reason why he should live and declare the goodness of his God. In the iron furnace of affliction, his faith was purified and its right to the reverent consideration of mankind was demonstrated.

It was a present goodness which gave the psalmist his joy. It was a goodness which he experienced, when he worshipped with his brethren in the temple of his God. Nature was to him a manifestation of the divine. "In his hand are the deep places of the earth; The heights of the mountains are his also. The sea is his and he made it." The cedars of Lebanon were the planting of Jehovah. He opened his hand and satisfied every living thing with food. He sent forth his spirit and removed the face of the ground. "The earth is full of thy riches." If we wish to restore the ancient spirit of worship, we must learn to rejoice in the gifts of nature as the expression of the goodness of God. Even her earthquakes and volcanoes have their lessons for us, though we no longer regard their destruction of human life as evidence of God's hot anger against sin.

The goodness of Jehovah assures us that there is a connection between effort and results. The gambler's view of the world is wrong. Luck is not lord of life. The power that brought us forth and awakens in us high aspiration will keep faith with us. As there is order in the physical world, so there is order in the moral world. We have a right to work for the coming of the kingdom of God. It is not in vain that men have ideals for their cities and their states. The boodler and the grafter will not forever control our politics. Cities will sometime be built for human habitation and even we shall learn that business was made for man and not man for business. We shall then act as if we considered health and virtue and happiness important than dollars. If God is good, we shall not at last be put to intellectual and moral confusion. Our little systems may have their day and cease to be, but they will be found to have a place in the eternal order.

In the hour of triumph we need the chastening thought of the perfect Goodness. Success may easily make fools of us. It narrows our vision. We do not take account of the factors in our success and therefore we are filled with vain conceit. We do not see the greatness of many whom the world counts failures. Defeat may be the beginning of success if we have faith. Instead of giving themselves up to complaints and to bitter reflections upon the hard conditions imposed by fate, men of faith accept defeat as a sharp reminder to them of their uncertain purposes and shallow views of goodness. To learn through painful experience is the part of a man. But the lesson must be worth learning. "If this life be not a real fight, in which something is eternally gained for the universe by success, it is no better than a game of private theatricals from which one may withdraw at will." For the Christian there is something to be gained and therefore he feels that life is a real fight.

The Greatest Man of His Time

At the time of the celebration of Tolstoi's eightieth birthday, William Dean Howells expressed the judgment that the great Russian was the greatest man of his time. He compared him with Napoleon and Lincoln, and concluded that the former was out of the reckoning because of his lack of humanity. The latter could never have reached Tolstoi's heights by sheer power of his own personality aside from the incident of being made president at a time that would have made immemorial the name of any man associated with the occasions he was called upon to meet. A lesser man than Lincoln might have been remembered for his ability to meet them, and there was that in Lincoln aside from the occasions that helped to make him which might have found other avenues of expression and rendered his name immortal; but, with all his greatness, it must be acknowledged that Lincoln had not found his niche until the presidency came to him, when he was well past middle life. Tolstoi's greatness depends upon no official position. It is by sheer power of intellect, will and greatness of heart. Even the Czar said, upon his death, that the creations of his mind had made his time the golden age of literature in Russia. At the time of his eightieth birthday the world celebrated—not all the world, but all that inner circle of those who recognize idealism as the mightiest constructive factor in the final making of worlds and who believe that there are prophets in our own time. It is safe to say that to no other living man of unofficial position have the newspapers and magazines given such attention as they have given Tolstoi for many years, to say nothing of the fact that his last days have been chronicled with almost as much fidelity as a monarch's might have been. And this is to the world's credit—that while it calls its greatest prophet impractical, it yet recognizes that he is its prophet. A few there have been, outside bureaucratic Russia, who have doubted his motives and his moral power, but most of the intelligent world have paid him the tribute of admiration for the supreme greatness of his character, the devotion of his life to humanity, the undoubted purity of his motives and the all but unequaled power of his mind.

The Greatest Saint in Christendom

If the renunciation of self, the service of fellow-man and the devout endeavor to find out what Jesus would have you do are what characterize a saint, then Tolstoi was the greatest saint in Christendom. Some have called him a literalist. On the contrary, he was supremely an idealist. His literalism consisted in an exacting endeavor to live up to what the idealism of Jesus taught him. Most of the Christian teachers are engaged in efforts to explain how Jesus either did not mean just what he said, or how in what he said is the ideal goal of all moral progress rather than the literal commandment for today's living. True, much of what Jesus said his followers do try to live up to, or at least preach as the thing they ought to live up to. But such great, fundamental moral commandments as "Resist not evil," "Love your enemies," we hold as ideals merely, scarce believing that Jesus intended they should be literally obeyed, or if we do try to obey them in our personal relations, we do not believe in them as commercial or international maxims. But Tolstoi accepted these surpassing social ideals as literal maxims of living, in both personal and corporate life, and the only road to happiness. He left no cult and deprecated any efforts to create Tolstoian groups or settlements, because he believed in each man living in the midst of his fellows and living his own life in his own way. He has also been called a supreme individualist, but it can only be so when we define individualism as that life which is perfected in complete self-forgetfulness. He has been called an anarchist because he protested so much against governmental oppressions and modern forms of military and suppressive control, but he denied this fervently and said he was not against government, but only against government by police methods, and that he was in favor of moral government, the government that would be founded upon the golden rule. Renunciation of self was Tolstoi's religious effort. He was ascetic in a certain sense, but it was not the asceticism of a St. Simon, that withdrew from the world as bad, or of a St. Thomas, that found sainthood in prayer, but the personal asceticism that sought to live for the poor that he might help them, the asceticism of a St. Francis. "His life was one of the greatest events in the history of mankind," said William Dean Howells.

The Power of a Personality

Personality is determined, says Graham Taylor, not by the power to command your fellows, but by the extent to which you can enter sympathetically into the lives of all men. Tolstoi's life is the record of such a personality. Born to wealth and aristocratic position, he made a military record in his twenties that promised preferment, and was one of the social idols of the court life at St. Petersburg. He traveled and saw the society life of the European capitals, and he wrote and heard his name flattered as one equal to the great Turgineff. But his heart was ever yearning for something he could not find. He forsook society and the army and went to live on his ancestral estate and busied self with schools for the children of his peasantry. In that he found some peace, but not real peace. He wrote scathingly of social sins and governmental wrong and was exiled from Moscow. At forty he seriously considered suicide because life was so meaningless. Then he made the great renunciation. He renounced every vanity of personal emolument that the world seeks after. He turned to the study of the Gospels and determined that "Resist not evil" was the central truth of all. He ceased to write works of fiction and devoted himself to moral philosophy, taking Jesus as his monitor, because Jesus lived what he taught and taught that alone, which would rid the world of the evil of selfishness. He donned peasant's garb that he might know no vanity and lived on their homely fare that he might be able to sympathize with them. He earned his daily bread with his hands that he might know he was not living by the sweat of another's brow and would have given his estates to the poor but for the objections of his family. Feeling he had no right to compel them to surrender what they desired he deeded the estate over to them and became personally penniless. He lived in great kindliness and always sought to think of the things of others as his own. While his family did not accept his teaching and the Countess lived much as before, her devotion to him was beautiful and she sat for the whole day after his death moaning "The light of the world has gone out." Tolstoi's whole life was the effort of his person to find the way into the hearts of his fellows and to do them good. He cared little for the art of his writings but only that they might inspire men to do better and the world to more nearly live in peace. His culture was of that refined and Christly kind that could find satisfaction in the least cultured of men and he said he never found out how to live and be happy until he quit seeking things for himself and began to seek only that which would make others happy.

A Peasant Greater Than His Prince

When Tolstoi passed through Moscow a few months ago, though he tried to go unannounced, rumors of his coming brought a multitude to the station and the streets were thronged as they never are on occasions of the Czar's visits. It was the masses that thus tried to pay their tribute to one they revered and whose name they would gladly add to their list of canonized saints. Though he unsparingly denounced the government as murderous because of its wholesale executions and had long been under the ban himself, the powers that be never dared touch his venerated person lest a flame be kindled in Russia that could not be extinguished. The sniffling criticism that he was not molested because he was not influential in Russia cannot explain why his works were under the ban and any one found printing or selling them was imprisoned. More than once Tolstoi appealed to the courts and the imperial government that not the man who dealt in his writings but the writer should suffer the penalty of the law, only to be refused the privilege of bearing the cross for his disciples. When the Czar desires to see a subject he commands him to appear at the palace, but when he desired to see Tolstoi he came to Tula, the railroad station near Yasnaya Poliana, asking the old philosopher if he would meet him on the station platform. This Tolstoi did and it is said talked to the Czar as he would to any other young man, giving him frank council as to his duties to his people and pointing out to him that not by bureaucracy but by democracy he could best serve the Russian people and the world. The Czar desired that the Holy Synod should remove its ban and bury him in churchly state. His attitude toward the greatest and most unanswerable critic of his regime marks the Czar as a much better man than his councilors and one who would do better in his rule if he could. He manifested solicitude for the peasant philosopher in the tragic events of his last days and showed that he, like all the rest of the world, could not read the writings of Tolstoi and ever see life quite as he had before. "He rends our hearts with his sincerity, his charity, his kindness."

Tolstoi and the "Big Stick"

Criticism of Tolstoi and his work never reached such violence as in the hands of the Apostle of the Big Stick. Others have criticised him for lack of logic and for impracticability, but to Mr. Roosevelt it was left to say that "in him there is a dark streak that tells of moral perversion." Another critic of Tolstoi's answered "just such a remark as Pilate might have made about Jesus." One has at least to be kind to be just. But here was a defender of militarism as a world necessity striking one of his characteristic blows at one who iconoclastically would banish physical violence from the face of the earth. But Mr. Roosevelt was not content. He turned his victim on the spit to roast him doubly with his wrath and repeated, "he has in him certain dreadful qualities of the moral pervert," and then thrust him through and through by saying, "taken as a whole, his moral and philosophical teachings, so far as they had any influence at all, would have an influence for bad" and charged him with "complete inability to face the facts" and readiness "to turn aside from truth to chase any phantom, however foolish." But we wonder why such wrathful denunciation on the unoffending head of him whose supreme contention was that no violence should be done, when we find the same critic consoling the world by telling it "that he has swayed only feeble and fantastic folk," that "the evils he denounces are not of much moment among us" and that "no man of robust common sense and high ideals is affected by his teachings." One can understand how Grand Duke Boris could refer to him as "that old blasphemer with his babbling nonsense" and how the parish priests could tell their superstitious worshipers that he was in league with the devil, but it is difficult to comprehend why the big stick should be wielded with such knock-'em-down-and-carry-'em-off a flourish when its poor victim was so innocuous and feeble. We are afraid that in this case the big stick has rebounded with telling force upon the head of its wielder. Had the victim been Nietsche instead of Tolstoi, it would at least have been more fitting.

The Tragedy of Tolstoi's Life

Tolstoi felt the tragedy in the world. It clung to his heart like a nettle from his boyhood. He tried to escape it in the vainglory and dissipations of aristocratic youth. It led him to the supreme tragedy on Calvary and there he found what he believed was the only way of peace. His novels are all tragic. "War and Peace" is by many counted the greatest piece of constructive imagination ever worked into prose. It can at least be mildly claimed to have no equal aside from Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables." "Anna Karenina" grips its readers until it fairly haunts their sleep. The tragedy of life and the recompence that follows sin is always his theme. He once, in despair at the defeat of his efforts to find truth, almost resolved his own career in tragedy. Then he turned to what the world of art considered a tragical renunciation and wished all his novels burned because they so inadequately set forth the solution of his struggle and that of the world. His days were of the same tragical setting. Whether in the debility that clouded his mind as dissolution approached, or whether, as report hints, his son and the manager of the family estate had so raised the rentals of the poor peasantry that it broke his heart, he tried to escape to utter renunciation and sought to spend his last days in solitude where none could spend and be spent for him. His last words were "So many millions suffering, why do you think so much about me?" He sought the poverty of the peasantry but his family clung about him and denied him the pangs the peasant feels when sickness and helplessness leave his morrow unprovided for by another. Telling the truth to a government that martyred its truth-tellers he was denied the privilege of being martyred for his devotion to the truth, as his fellows were. Seeking to convince a world that the Jesus they worshiped should be literally lived by, he died like his great Master, seeing no appreciable effect of his life and teachings on the civilization of his time. He made no pretence of divinity and denounced all superstition, but the very peasantry for whose sake he lived will number him among their saints and worship his memory. All this but testifies that he did not solve the mysteries, and that to no man is it given to find utter peace in a world where wrong abides. In the tragedy of life is the secret of salvation and to him who suffers most shall most be given in the final solution of things. And yet the great Russian's soul, emotional before all else, found rare peace personally by his renunciation of selfishness and his devotion to the good of others.

A True Prophet—But Impractical

The true prophets have been ever found impractical by their own times. They were stoned and sawn asunder in ruder days, and excommunicated and anathematized in the more enlightened, but succeeding generations honor and learn of them. The true prophets of the Old Testament were made martyrs for preaching ideals and so insisting on them that the powers that be were incensed, while in every time there were false prophets who were favored by those same powers and fed on the fat of the land. Tolstoi was impractical, but he will grow on the conscience of humanity as times goes on. It scarce becomes lesser men to criticise such moral Titans as the great Russian until they can themselves show the same amount of unselfishness and live as nearly up to their moral ideals as he did. In his protest against dogma he has most of the modern world's sympathy. In his preaching of human service as the true business of life he has much of modern Christianity with him. In his interpretations of Scripture he may be found often fantastic but in his Christian spirit he is all but invulnerable. In his protest against all violence he will have an ever growing following until the Kingdom of God is come in peace. In his idealistic efforts to renounce the world he will have few followers for most men interpret their Christian obligation to be that of taking hold of the world as it is and doing their little to lift it up. Tolstoi declared for immediate realization of the ideal without the painful process of development by which the world seems to be in the making. He was a model in life and philosophy for the New World. If all men were to become such as he was the Kingdom of Heaven would be come. To this present age he was idealistic to illogicalness, but to the golden age of ideals forwhich we all wish, this age will appear very illogical in its poverty of ideal living. His teaching was simple and could all be summed up in "let each one live each day as Christ would live." He did not pretend that he was able to live up to that high ideal but said he only stumblingly tried to. History may yet write that what Rousseau did for France, Tolstoi did for Russia and Tolstoi was consistent.

An interesting address was given before the Outlook Club of Chicago, recently, by Professor Maitra of Calcutta. He is perhaps the foremost representative of the Brahmo Somaj in India, the society, which has been best known in the west through the personality and work of Kesheb Chunder Sen. The institution is broad in its scope, attempting as it does to combine the most important features of the different faiths of India. The leaders of Christendom who have lectured in India from time to time, have expressed their indebtedness to the Brahmo Somaj, as at least a preparation for the larger effectiveness of Christianity in that land. Professor Maitra believes that his group of co-workers is making decided progress toward the realization of its ideals.

An interesting comparison of the different items that go to make up the cost of living in the United States is supplied in the statement that for all civil purposes whatsoever our expenditures are two hundred twenty millions of dollars annually or thirty-three per cent of the total amount of the nation's governmental budget, while, on the other hand, the cost of the army on its present footing is one hundred sixty-three millions; the cost of the navy, one hundred sixteen millions; and the cost of pensions, the result of war, one hundred sixty-two millions, just twice the amount of the entire civil budget. There is food for reflection in this fact.

A Book I Haven't Read

Some Unlearned Reflections Indulged While Cutting the Leaves of a Notable Volume

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

I am going to write about Edward Scribner Ames' new book before reading a single paragraph of it.

It came into my hands the week it was published—more than a month ago—and I know I have done injustice to the publishers and my good friend, the author, not to mention the readers of The Christian Century, by the long delay in reviewing it.

I could have had some one else review it. I have been mean about it. The itching hands of our book-reviewing staff—Willett, Campbell, Taylor, Jones, Jordan, Endres, Lines—all reached for it, or to be frankly exact, clutched at it, with a green and not very Christian look in their eyes, and I have had to take the book from the office library to my study at home in order to keep it in my possession.

I say I've been mean about it, for I might have known I could not find time to read it at once, and the readers of this paper deserve to be told about the birth of a new book in the Disciples' brotherhood just as promptly as the members of a family deserve to be told about the birth of a man-child. A book is a great thing anywhere. Among the Disciples of Christ the coming of a book—a real book—is a greater event than the Centennial Convention. We have had a great many conventions, and could have another Centennial on three months' notice if we wanted to. But we have had few books—fewer books than annual conventions. I am not writing playfully. I am not exaggerating. Literally we have produced more national annual conventions than books, real books.

We Disciples have been so busy working at our task that we've not had time to write literature or science.

That is bad economy for us, for our cause. In a book a man touches the minds of those who sit at the places of power, who touch the buttons which start truth ringing round the world.

It is better to write a book than to hold a revival meeting. It is better to write one great book on Christian unity, for example, than to proselyte ten thousand Methodists and Presbyterians to your denomination.

And here I am on a railway train with five hours before me and a real book in my bag. I am speeding away from Chicago, and my plan was to spend these five hours in reading the book and tomorrow's home-coming five hours in writing about it.

I made myself comfortable in the train, took the book from the bag, got out my pocket-knife and began cutting the leaves. Have you ever analyzed your emotion during the twenty or thirty minutes you spend in getting a book ready to read? My own feeling is the acme of luxury. I love to sit at my study desk, lay the book flat, leisurely examine the binding and the title, then open the pages to the copyright, the title-page, the dedication (if there is one), the introduction, the table of contents and then, reaching for my paper-knife, start to cut my way into the text itself. Here is the intensely fascinating part of it. I go on cutting with a rythmical movement while my eye takes in the chapter headings, the name of other authors in the foot-notes, the suggestive phrases put in quotation marks or italics, and occasionally I get a real round idea without trying to think at all. This, I take it, is the explanation of the feeling of luxury one has—he is eager with expectancy, he is inside the book, and yet the effortful task of reading it discerningly has not begun. His eye is chasing will-o' the wisps; fugitive impressions flit in and out of his brain; he doesn't have to think critically—yet.

Of this irresponsible mood my paper-knife is the symbol. But here I am in the train with my friend's book in my hands trying to open its pages with my pocket-knife. It doesn't go right. The square edge of the blade is too dull, and if I use the sharp edge I am in constant fear that it will cut an uneven line instead of gently tearing its way through the crease. I like to have a nice shaggy edge to my book when I've done cutting it, and this I cannot get with my pen-knife.

So while I labor away there grows in me a sense of the significance of the outside of the book—its setting—the book apart from its text, so to speak. I cut far enough into it to see some chapter headings, to get the general curve of the author's mind. My eye catches the great teachers' names in the footnotes—William James, John Dewey, Harold Hoeffding, Herbert Spencer, W. Robertson Smith—and the splendid array of contemporary scholars of lesser fame and I find myself impelled to write before I read a paragraph.

It isn't the professional book reviewer's tempter that whispers to me to review the book without reading it. That fellow-craftsman is the victim of haste, of editorial pressure, of the call for "copy" from the printer. My impulsion has no such origin. There is something in the front of my mind, whether it is an idea or an emotion, I know not, but it feels as if it were going to obstruct any effort to either study the text of this book or to write about the text until I have gotten rid of it.

And yet I know that if I spilled this idea or emotion, or whatever it is, upon the page of The Christian Century it would cover all the space I had intended to give to the book. Very well, then, I decide; I will reverse my earlier intention of reading the book today and writing a review of it tomorrow. I will write today and read tomorrow. And I'll be honest and tell my readers the truth that the book lies unread and only partially cut, under the tablet on which I am now writing.

Just tne "feel" of this volume calls for a paragraph. "Sumptuous" is the word, I think, the reviewers would use here. It is handsomely gotten up. By this I do not mean that it is decorated like a Christmas gift-book. For it is very plain. But its pages are in large, clear type, printed on fine, rough-finished book paper and bound so superbly that it lies open of itself. Houghton Mifflin Company, of Boston, did the work and they ask you to pay them for it at the rate of $2.50 per book. That is a good deal of money to pay for a book these days, but I think there is good psychology in it, after all, and since this is a book on psychology, it seems appropriate to suggest that the payment of two dollars and a half will insure its most thorough reading, on the principle that the purchaser must get his money's worth.

I linger over the "Dedication" page. It was this that touched the tender spot in my psychology a moment ago, and started the gathering of that emotion, or whatever it was (I have decided that it was not an idea), in the front of my mind, inhibiting a serious study of the text today and a serious review tomorrow. That dedication made me forget that Doctor Ames was a scholar, a professor, a scientist. All my ambitious intentions of getting up as "scholarly" a review as I was capable of composing were sunk in the emotion released by the words of the dedication. As I went on carefully cutting the pages, noting the great names I have mentioned above and the vocabulary of science in which the author couched his thought, the words with which the book was consecrated kept urging themselves upon my mind:

> To my friends, the Members of the Hyde Park Church of Disciples, Chicago.

The author of this book, I kept thinking, is a member of our family. He is a Disciple, a preacher and pastor of a flock, as his father was before him.

This book is the most significant scientific product that has ever appeared in our Disciple family. I do not now think of another book by a Disciple author which Houghton Mifflin have published, or Scribners or Macmillans—with the exception of James Lane Allen's writings; and strange as the vocabulary of this book will sound in a Disciple's mouth, it swells my heart with pride—family pride—to know that at last Disciple men are attaining those levels of scholarship from which they can speak to other scholars in the high converse of science.

This is very foolish talk, I know. It isn't the way of an editor to let his sentiments run on this way. He should remember the cold-headed people who will read his pages, the publishers, the other scholars who will be interested in the things said about their colleague's book. Very well, then, I am not an editor while on this train. I am a member of the family, the Disciple family, and I don't care who hears me say it—I am proud of this book because it was made in our family by an earnest minded son of the church.

We should be proud of our scholars—when we have good reason to know them to be honest men and true. We should listen to their utterances heedfully, giving due patience to understand them. We should give them wide margin in which to be mistaken, without forfeiting our love and fellowship, in the belief that thus trusted, they will correct themselves—or at last correct us all.

I do not know that these exhortations are relevant to the present book and its author. I have not read the book. I do not know what its thesis is. But I do know the author, his life, his loyalty, his inspiring ministry. And if I find anything in the book, when I come to read it, which I believe is not true, I shall criticise it right straight out, but I will not criticise the author for saying it. And I shall still love him as a member of the family, a brother, and seek his counsel oftener just because he believes something different from my own belief.

This knowing a man as well as his writing is most important. Who is Edward Scribner Ames? Most of my readers know that he is a professor in the University of Chicago—Professor of Philosophy is, I believe, his title. But to know the professor is not to know Ames. Back of his title there is a man who has come up to his title through a definite line of fateful experiences. One might almost say he was forordained to write a book on the psychology of religion. At least his own experience and training foreordained such a book.

Dr. Ames, as I have said is a Disciple preacher's son. He was educated in Drake University, Yale and Chicago Universities. While a student at Drake, he was pastor of a little church near Des Moines. When he left to go to Yale, I succeeded him in the little church. The people talked much about him. One day I asked an elderly lady upon whom I was making a pastoral call and who was praising Mr. Ames' preaching, to tell me about some of his sermons. She could think of but one, she said, and that on the text, "God is love." I asked her to tell me what he said. She was thoughtful for a time, and then replied, "I cannot remember what he said, but it has been much easier to love God since then than it was before."

Mr. Ames went to Yale to study theology. After two years he entered the department of philosophy. Later he came to the University of Chicago where, in 1896, he took his degree of Ph. D., in philosophy and psychology. Called to the chair of philosophy in Butler College, Indianapolis, he accepted and remained there until 1900, when he was invited to an instructorship at his alma mater, in connection with the pastorate of the Hyde Park Church of Disciples. Here he remained until the present, rising in professorial rank by two promotions.

Now the great thing about this book that lies underneath my writing tablet is, if I may make a guess (not having yet read it), that it will undertake to state this religious life of ours in terms of a new science—psychology. And that is going to shock some of us. We are accustomed to having our religion put in the venerable terms of theological science only. And some of us who read this book will probably close it and say that the author has humanized everything, that he has squeezed the divine out of religion and that it's all just a "natural" process.

I say there'll be some who will talk this way and feel this way. But there will be others, and I rather think I shall be among them, who will feel when the book is done that a successful attempt at stating religious experience in terms of psychology will help us to construct a better theology than our fathers had, a theology that will greatly bless and enrich human life.

And anything that does that I want to be in favor of.

Helpful Books and Why They Help

A Symposium by Men Who Read

By Harry G. Hill.

It is a habit of mine, whether good or bad, to read simultaneously two or more books on more or less closely related themes. Whatever disadvantages this practice may possess it has some points in its favor. At least it has become a habit that has often furnished opportunity for comparison, and has enabled me to read one author in the light of another.

Recently I have been reading Prof. E. S. Ames' "Psychology of Religious Experience," Irving King's "Development of Religion," and Davenport's "Primitive Traits In Religious Revivals." Though some may and will take issue with Prof. Ames, he is certainly lucid and attractive in style and very free from technical and special wording and phrasing. I find Prof. King more pedantic, while Davenport is surely fascinating. Each of these writers is convincing in argument and conclusion, though I am inclined to believe that there might be a criticism made upon the choice of material in some instances in the writings of each.

I have also read Prof. Ross of Wisconsin in his little essay on "Latter Day Sinners and Saints," which I find is merely an elaboration of some ideas he formerly suggested in his "Sin and Society." Prof. Ross is earnest, sometimes almost intemperate, but he almost intoxicates his readers with the sparkling cup of epigram and dashing style that is almost irresistible.

I have also read Mathew's "Social Teachings of Jesus," and find the familiar method which I noted in the classroom when I heard him give his lectures on "The Religious Teachings of Jesus."

R. J. Campbell's "Christianity and the Social Order" does not sound half so non-conforming in America as I am led to think it sounds to English ears.

The little essay, "My Religion in Everyday Life," by Josiah Strong, is very suggestive and might well be placed in the hands of legalists and individualists.

It is not pleasant to read of human misery but there is satisfaction in finding out that much of the misery of the world can be cured and that it probably will be cured. For this reason I enjoyed reading, "Misery and Its Causes," by Edward T. Devine. Laziness and dissipation do not account for all the poverty and wretchedness of men. "Out of health," "out of work," and "out of friends," are given as causes of poverty and its accompanying misery. Society as well as the individual has to deal with the causes of misery and it alone can remove some of them. The cure of misery is to be found in sound heredity, protected childhood, prolonged working age, freedom from preventable disease, freedom from professional crime (shut up the criminal until he is cured), indemnity against losses occasioned by death, accident, illness, and compulsory idleness, rational education, normal standards of living, and social religion.

"Psychology and Religion," by Cutten, is a helpful book to one who wishes to catalogue religious phenomena. Here we have discussed mysticism, ecstasy, visions, stigmatization, monasticism and asceticism, religious epidemics, contagious phenomena, faith cure, Christian Science, and other themes of interest to the student of religion. One must not take too seriously what the psychologists say about religion. They can help us to see inconsistencies and to get rid of bad habits and this service is of great value. But there are many things which the psychologists themselves do not yet know, and therefore it is well for us not to receive them as infallible guides.

I have been carrying about with me lately the "Confessions" of St. Augustine. The influence of Augustine on the mediaeval church and on some of the more important Protestant thinkers makes it desirable that one become acquainted with him. But the interest awakened by reading his frank statements about himself is more than antiquarian. The genuineness of his faith and the strength of his intellect quicken the faith of the reader and increase his interest in the great problems of religion.

I have recently read the following books: "The Story of a Century," Garrison; "Bolenge." Dye; "A Certain Rich Man," White; "The Shepherd of the Hills," and "The Calling of Dan Matthews," Wright; "The Moslem World," Zwemmer; "Modern Criticism and the Old Testament Preaching," Smith; "Capital," Marx; "The Struggle for Existence," Mills; "Tools and Man," Gladden; "Christianity and Social Problems," Abbott. Here are books bearing on the great problem of world evangelization, the problem of socialism, along with three books of fiction. I have recently put on my shelves the following books, purchased from the Christian Century: "The Psychology of Religious Experience," Ames; "Reconstruction in Theology," King; "Jesus Christ and the Christian Character," Peabody; "The Social Teachings of Jesus," Mathews; "The Industrial Conflict," Smith, and the ten volumes of the Forward Mission Study Reference Library, containing such books as "The Unfinished Task," Barton; "God's Missionary Plan for the World," Bashford; "The Missionary Enterprise," Bliss, etc. These books have helped me because I am deeply interested in the evangelization of the world and in the social problems that confront the preachers and the churches of this day. I believe the pulpit has a message for the men and the conditions of this present time and I am seeking to interpret the words and the life of the Master in terms of the twentieth century. I am making my Men's Bible Class, also, a sort of clearing house for all these pregnant questions which so grip the life of men in our day. God help us to so vitalize our preaching that there may be a real advance of the kingdom of Christ.

"The Poet's Poet, and Other Essays," by Bishop William A. Quayle. I was fascinated by the fluent style of this book, and helped by its delineations which are fine to the fineness of cameos.

"New Creations in Plant Life," by W. S. Harwood, an account of the life and work of Luther Burbank. This book is worth its weight in gold. It helps a preacher who must spend much time indoors to keep in sympathetic touch with the glories of the out-of-doors.

"The Saints' Everlasting Rest," by Richard Baxter. Having escaped the enforced reading of this old book when I was a boy, I never felt attracted to it until recently, although I have had a copy of it for years. What a blessed old book it is! How quaint and calm it is. It has helped me to forget the feverish haste in which we are forced to live, and to enjoy, by contemplation, "the rest that remains for the people of God."

"Jesus and the Gospel," by James Denney. I found this book rather uninteresting at the first reading, but having gone through it a second time, it has helped me to a deeper sense of the reality of our Lord.

"The Person and Place of Jesus Christ," by Forsyth, and "The Ethics of Jesus," by James Stalker, are two books into which I have only started, but which I think I shall enjoy, the latter especially.

"Pendennis," by Thackeray, "Nights With Uncle Remus," by Harris, "Times of Retirement," by Matheson, are some of the books with which I have filled some leisure hours recently.

Liberty, Mo.

Irving King's "Development of Religion." This is a study of primitive religion in terms of social psychology. It presents the beginning of religion in the race from a new point of view. It is a scientific, yet sympathetic and constructive book.

Samuel McCord Crother's "The Pardoner's Wallet," and "Among Friends." These books of essays are refreshing expressions of a mind which is both wise and playful. The author sees deeply into life and is yet good humored and vital.

John White Chadwick's "Theodore Parker, Preacher and Reformer." This is a well written biography of a Unitarian insurgent, an abolitionist, and a man who was a kind of national conscience personified. It is timely now during the celebration of the 100th anniversary of his birth and the 50th anniversary of his death.

William James' "The Meaning of Truth." This book is the last contribution of the author to the series of interesting and illuminating books by which he gained the distinction of being America's foremost writer on psychological and philosophical subjects. This volume is a further exposition of Pragmatism, of which James was a founder, if not the founder.

Addison W. Moore's "Pragmatism and Its Critics." This is the latest contribution to the interpretation and defense of this new philosophy.

Stanton Coit's "The Spiritual Nature of Man." This is a most suggestive and solving treatment of the strength and possibilities of the social elements of religious faith and development.

Harold Bell Wright's "The Uncrowned King." A fascinating, impressive parable of the strength of Really-is as compared with Seems-to-be.

Gilbert K. Chesterton's "The Ball and the Cross." A thrilling piece of fiction, setting forth the adventures of a conservative in religion and an atheist, who are delighted to meet each other after each has tried for years to find some one serious enough about these matters to put up a real fight.

Carolyn Wells' "A Nonsense Authology." A blessed means of relaxation from acute theological cramp.

One of the books which I have recently read and found helpful is "The Ethics of Jesus," by King. I have found this book helpful because it is an honest attempt to make a critical study of the ethics of the great Teacher. Professor King does not attempt to make the teachings of Jesus bolster up any theories of his own, but he tries to state what Jesus actually taught. This book has helped me because of its suggestiveness. You do not place this book on the back shelf when you have read it; it becomes your guide for further study.

In connection with this work of Professor King's, I have recently read again Professor Leighton's most excellent book, "Jesus Christ and the Civilization of To-day." Although treating the same subject, he does it very differently. The aim of the book is stated in the first sentence of the introduction, which is "to offer an interpretation of the fundamental ethical principles of Jesus in their bearing on the problems of social life and individual destiny as these present themselves to the men of to-day." This book does not profess to be a critical study, but it is one of the most helpful books that I have read in the last three years.

During the past week I have read the proof sheet of a splendid little book by A. McLean on "Thomas and Alexander Campbell." This book will soon be issued from the press of Jennings and Graham and it ought to have a wide distribution among the preachers of the other churches. It is one of the best presentations of the fundamental principles of the religious movement with which we are identified that I have ever seen. The author is so candid in his treatment of the subject that he points out the weakness as well as the strength of these leaders.

If I had not already exceeded my limit I would like to say that I have been greatly helped by the article, "A Mistake in Strategy," in the October number of The American Journal of Theology, and by the article, "Modern Evangelism in the Light of Modern Psychology," in the November number of The Bibical World. I commend these articles to others.

Two books by Wm. Newton Clarke, "The Christian Doctrine of God," and "Sixty Years With the Bible," I have read and re-read with delight and profit. These books, like others of Dr. Clarke's writing, give me a large view of God and His dealings with humanity; especially helpful to me is the devotional atmosphere that envelopes these books like a garment. Dr. James Denney's "Jesus and the Gospel," Peabody's "The Approach to the Social Question," and Dr. Orr's "The Faith of a Modern Christian," are books that I regard highly. The last named I am still reading—indeed it is the newest theological work I have. I like Dr. Orr's rare combination of open-mindedness and a certain quiet insistance on fundamentals. A little book by Dr. Grenfell just off the press entitled, "A Man's Helpers," has helped me. I am reading "The British Weekly" this year anl await each number impatiently so rich and full of interest are its pages.

Two books that have been perhaps the most helpful I have read in the past few years are by Dr. Charles Edward Jefferson. They are, "Things Fundamental," and "The Character of Jesus."

In "Things Fundamental," Dr. Jefferson discusses the great fundamentals of religion in the light of present day scholarship and interpretation. He goes over the foundation stones again to find ground for a growing, working faith. He is clear, simple, forceful, and master of a style the preacher of to-day ought to cultivate.

"The Character of Jesus," differs from the usual "Life of Jesus," in that it looks upon the gospels as character sketches—not as biographies. The author gives us the various characteristics of Jesus, dwelling especially upon his masculine strength. Dr. Jefferson emphasizes the necessity of the heroic in our present day Christianity—a thing the preacher ought to dwell upon more and more.

Dr. Jefferson has written a number of helpful books, "Quiet Talks to Earnest People," "Quiet Hints to Growing Preachers," and his latest book, "The Building of the Church,"—all most helpful.

I aim to read a book a week, depending upon its size, or its equivalent, and in the last few weeks I have read "The Practice of Prayer," by G. Campbell Morgan, and "The Transfigured Church," by J. H. Jowett. They are both leaders in the modern pulpit, if not the very first leaders, and whatever they write indicates that they have stood in the sanctuary alone. The first is a common-sense analysis of prayer, dealing with its possibility, platform, preparation, place and practice. Dr. Morgan's conception of spiritual life and the second coming of our Lord makes him, to my own heart, the cleverest Scripture interpreter that I read after. Doctor Jowett's book referred to is a volume of sermons, and they helped me because they are strong, scriptural and wide-visioned. This worldly, go-as-you-please club life, so characteristic of the present day church, is not equipped for the world conquest; but, if the church is to meet the issues before it, it must live in the atmosphere of transfiguration.

I have gotten much from the "Sidelights on Religion," by J. Brierley, and all his books are good. He makes one think, a thing that is usually hard to do. I was charmed with "The Uncrowned King," by Harold Bell Wright because of its picturesque style and beautiful lesson. The author is an artist. M. R. Ely put in my hands a few days ago "Sermons, Essays and Outlines," by his father, Simpson Ely, and I was immediately interested because it was compiled by the son, which is refreshing in these days when there is so much lack of filial love.

I am now in the midst of "The Science of Poetry and the Philosophy of Language," by Hudson Maxim. It is a princely volume, dealing with the evolution of analogical speech, the principles of poetry and the application of those principles to language. It is the monument of a scholar and I am delighted with its presentation because it instructs.

Christian Temple, Baltimore.

By Allan B. Philputt.

I have recently read two books by Rudolf Eucken, professor of Philosophy in the University of Jena. How much they have helped me I cannot say, but they have greatly interested me. The first is his "Problem of Human Life," showing how the great philosophers from Plato to our own time have viewed the problem of life, its purpose, aim and goal. It is the most readable history of philosophy known to me. His main contention is that conceptions are determined by life, not life by conceptions. Experience justifies the faith, he contends, that man's creative spiritual work will prevail against temporary negations and in new forms embody eternal truths. Eucken is an idealist in philosophy. He has written deeply concerning the reality of a supersensual world, the inevitableness of a self-revelation of divine purpose to the human soul, the necessity of a spiritual re-birth through ethical endeavor, the freedom of man's moral personality and its continuance beyond death. He is a Lutheran, but seems to find no place in his universe of law for miracles, thinks that divine attributes have never been granted exclusively to one man, that there has never been a special creation of the world, or a special revelation to any favored race.

The second book of his which I read is a small volume on "The Meaning and Value of Life." He at once goes to the heart of his problem by asking, "Has human life any meaning and value?" He seems to come out on the right side of the question, but like Muensterberg's "Eternal Values," the way is so difficult and tortuous that it raises m doubts than it allays. The Pragmatic philosophy has this merit, at least, that it gets to the goal quicker and easier. Still Eucken has been hailed by many of the "high brows" among theological thinkers as a friend and valiant defender of the idealism of the faith as against his friend and neighbor Prof. Haeckel, for instance, who finds only a mechanical and necessitarian universe, and a materialistic origin of spiritual forces.

Eucken's style is strikingly clear and fascinating and the first volume mentioned above is immensely valuable to any one who cares for the history of philosophic thought.

Indianapolis.

By W. F. Richardson.

Dr. James Denney's "Jesus and the Gospel" is one of the helpful books I have read, for the second time. Through its clear and thoughtful analysis of the various portions of the New Testament where the self-consciousness of Jesus most manifestly appears, I have been enabled to enter more closely into the mind of the Lord, and understand more clearly his unique relations to God and man. My faith has been clarified and strengthened in the Son of God.

Ruskin's "Seven Lamps of Architecture," from whose reading so many have gotten moral stimulus and esthetic delight, has given me pleasure, as I read it more carefully than ever before. One can hardly dwell with a student's eager spirit among these charming pages of Ruskin, wherein are mingled wit and wisdom, fact and fancy, science and poetry, without finding himself more in love with that sincerity and loftiness of purpose without which no man can be or do his best. I always rise from the reading of Ruskin with the feeling that I must be a better man and do a better work for others.

Shall I mention, as the last of the three books I have found most helpful during recent weeks, another old book, read again after the lapse of many years, Dicken's Bleak House? I wonder if others get as much sheer delight from reading Dickens? I find not a single dry page in him. His human sympathy, his eye for the grotesque, his wonderful artistic genius that makes his characters live and breathe before us, and the kindly humor that plays ever across his pages make his stories to me an intellectual stimulant, a social tonic and a personal delight.

By Claude E. Hill.

Among the books I have lately read with interest and profit the following three deserve, I think, special mention:

1. "Self Control and How to Secure It," by Prof. Paul Dubois. It is a work of 337 pages, well-written and contains matters of special interest to preachers. Preachers, above all others, need self-control. The book is practical, psychological, and in a splendid way magnifies the graces which are determinative in the search for happiness.

The following are some of the chapters: The Conquest of Happiness, Thought, The Act, Conscience, Education, Moral Clearsightedness, Egoism and Altruism, Meditation, Tolerance, Indulgence, Humility, Moderation, Patience, Chastity, etc.

2. "The Home of the Soul." A volume of simple, optimistic sermons by Pastor Charles Wagner. This man loves children and knows how to speak their language. The sermons are not to children, but they are not above children. The secret of Wagner's success may be attributed to two things, sincerity and simplicity. It is a good thing for a preacher to occasionally read a volume of sermons that have actually been preached. Wagner's sermons make you feel like preaching—not his sermons, but the simple gospel in a way that all who hear may understand. What a great thing it is to be pastor and shepherd of souls, to be known and loved by all the people! This is what you inwardly exclaim when you finish reading these sermons.

3. "The Education of the Will," by Jules Payot. This is a great book. It is written by a great man. It is up-to-date. It is the greatest work which has been produced covering this field. It is worth reading, not once, but twice.

I have, also, recently found time to read somewhat carefully, "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" by our own venerable brother —the youngest old man in America—W. T. Moore. One may not always agree with Brother Moore in his interpretations, but this is also a great book and can be read with much profit. Brother Moore throws much light on many dark questions.

A Business Man to His Pastor

Your business is religion, and you ought to know a great deal about it, if not all. Yet very often when I go to church to find out something about religion in its relation to me, you give me the same stuff about business and politics every fellow on the street talks to me and every newspaper is filled with; of course you phrase it a little better, and you try to connect it with some high ideals. but it is just the same stuff, and I want a rest from it; I want to hear something about a bigger and better side of my own nature, if I have such a thing.

If you will show me that I am a son of God and that I can and should live up to the relationship, I think I have sense enough to apply it and become a pretty decent son of man of myself. Have you anything in religion that is as real to you as leather is to me?

I want you to be a good citizen, I want you to go out and mix in with the politics of this town and so far as you can help to make things clean, but don't neglect your business to do it, don't turn your church into a caucus. If I were to treat my business as you do yours, neglect it to talk politics during business hours, and let every little rump convention come in and hold a session here, I should be in bankruptcy in thirty days, and not only lose my business but lose all the political influence for good I possess.

To me life is bigger than the next congressman from our district; he may through the neglect of our people be a good for nothing; but this country is not going to the dogs be cause a few of us make fools of ourselves. And I know that I shall work harder at the polls and make my business more decent, if you give me a rest once a week from this everlasting grind, and show me a vision of a good God and a redeemed humanity.—Universalist Leader.

The Tombs of Napoleon and Lafayette—A Study in Contrasts

By Edgar De Witt Jones.

In the course of our visit to Paris we pilgrimaged to two tombs that are as alike in costliness and splendor as the two careers they commemorate. The first is the magnificent tomb of Napoleon. In 1840 the ashes of the renowned Emperor were brought from St. Helena to Paris. A chariot drawn by twenty four horses harnessed four abreast and comparisoned by violet velvet bore the dust of the exile to its last resting place and all the while the bells of Notre Dame tolled with ponderous solemnity. There 'neath the great gilded dome, we looked on the huge sarcophagus of blood-red stone. Symbolic color of a career devoted to battle and wholesale slaughter.

There we saw the flags taken at Austerlitz and looked on the twelve figures grouped about the tomb signalizing twelve victories and over all the light from the art glass windows streamed strangely yellow and blue giving to the place a weird and uncanny effect. So sleeps the great, yet terrible soldier, Napoleon Bonaparte.

The other tomb is in an obscure corner of the city, hidden away in the cemetery of the Picpus, a spot within high walls where sleep many hundred who fell during the reign of terror. An American flag floats over that plain and simple tomb in the far corner of that burying ground and the name engraven in the marble is that of LaFayette, patriot and statesman, great heart and friend of George Washington, fellow soldier with him in the American Revolution. Of LaFayette an unprejudiced historian has written, "His life was identified with the history of France for upward of forty years and no stain is known to rest on the purity and disinterestedness of his public service."

What contrasts of tomb and of careers, what occasion for pause and sober reflection! Let us be grateful that we are leaving behind the spirit and genius of war with its carnage, its waste and its widespread terror, and that our faces are turned toward a fairer future when the war-drum shall throb no longer and peace universal shall begin its benignant reign.

Compensations

To be without the memory of a father who was true and a mother who was all that she should be is to suffer a loss which, to some extent, cannot be made up.

The waif found on the street, the boy growing up in the city, homeless and all but friendless, these must go through life with a certain something lacking, which Time, with all its wealth or distinction, can never make up.

But in the face of such discouragement success may be won.

Years ago a waif was found on the streets of a southern city. A few days ago he became the governor of his state.

Fifty years ago a little baby was found on the steps of a beautiful home in an eastern city. Today he is a minister of the gospel.

There are compensations which, for those who suffer loss, should not be forgotten.

But, best of all, God has said: "I will be a father to the fatherless." Again, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." And yet again we are told. "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord shall take me up."

What hinders us, he overcomes.

What is lacking, he will supply.

The Book World

Religious Thought

THE GOSPEL AND THE MODERN MAN, by Shailer Mathews, Dean of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, Author of "The Social Teaching of Jesus," "The Church and the Changing Order," "The Social Gospel," etc. Prof. Mathews here addresses himself to the task of discovering the value of the Gospel of Christ to the time in which we live. He defines the "modern man" as "the man who is controlled by the forces making tomorrow." He defines the Gospel as a historical document or the historical account of a life that was lived in another age and under radically different concepts and conditions. Then he addresses himself to the task of discovering what the fundamentals of that Gospel are—what it is that lies beneath the method of thought and expression and the social environment in which the record was cast, and to uncovering the same fundamentals in our time—what he terms the "modern equivalents" of the Gospel concepts. The result is that the Gospel, as fundamentally conceived, is as fresh in our age as in that in which it was given, and its value lies not in the metaphysics or a priori concepts that have enshrouded it, but in the material worth it possesses as a power to re-order life and keep the feet of men on the pathway that leads upward to God. The value of the Gospel, then, finally expressed, is as a religious guide to a salvation that is found in terms of the time to which it is applied, and a rigid insistence on the historical incidentals that accompany it but obscures its real vitality and destroys its working power. Its power is in the spirit that gives life, and not in the letter that kills. The great central truths of incarnation, sacrifice and resurrection all find social connotations and thus become of supreme worth in this age of social conceptions. By their altruistic power they become the real transformers of the age and meet the need of the man who "is controlled by the forces making tomorrow." (New York: The Macmillan Company. Pp. 327. $1.50 net.)

THE CRUCIALITY OF THE CROSS, by R. T. Forsyth, D. D., principal of Hackney College. Dr. Forsyth has flung himself into the breach with a great show of heroism, to defend the traditional view of the atonement against its modern interpretation. He stoutly contends for the conception that Christ's death was an offering made for the "satisfaction" of God's holy judgment. The standpoint is thoroughly theological, and therefore dialectic. The author is an intellectual gymnast of the first order. Whether one agrees with him or not, the book is interesting as a logical performance. Like all out-and-out theologians, Doctor Forsyth has the faculty of making simple things very hard. The book has many exalted passages in it, and its argument occasionally touches real human experience. But when one has laid it aside, he feels that he has been led mainly through a realm of unreality, of intellectual fiction. The book is based upon an idea of God, which has not felt the modifying, if not reconstructive, influence of present day knowledge. Still, it is a valuable book, and those who think in terms of the older dialectic will find it stimulating and, perhaps, comforting. (New York; George H. Doran company. Pp. 218, $1.50 net.)

FAITH AND HEALTH. The modern movement toward physical welfare has had many forms of expression. Many of these hark back to a fresh study of the miracles of Jesus, which are read in a new light. The philosophy and science of our day have done much to render the miracles intelligible to the modern mind. And there results at once the inquiry as to whether the miracles of our Lord have present worth for humanity. Dr. Charles Reynolds Brown, a prominent Congregational minister in California, has added a new volume to the long list of recent writings on this theme from men of every variety of opinion. In a series of chapters dealing with Christian Science, Suggestion, the Emmanuel Movement and the Gospel of Good Health, he considers in a sane and convincing manner the whole subject of the relation between Christianity and health. The book is moderate in spirit, constructive in statement and helpful to any one who wishes intelligent comprehension of the new redemptive work Christianity is doing for the bodies of men, and the dangers of fanaticism and ignorance which it needs to avoid. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Co., 1910, Pp. 234, $1.00 net.)

BIBLICAL CRITICISM. Professor J. W. McGarvey has contributed for many years to the Christian Standard of Cincinnati a department under this caption. Reprints of material found in that journal from 1893 to 1904 are gathered in this book. Professor McGarvey represents the extreme conservative view in biblical study, and is therefore himself a critic of the views which are generally accepted today by biblical scholars regarding the literary character of the Bible. The book has value as a compact and convenient collection of Professor McGarvey's statements on this theme during the last decade. It has also the value of presenting enough of the views combated to convince many of his open-minded readers that the writers whom he denounces with such severity are the interpreters whose opinions are rather to be chosen than his own. Next to the text books which deal in a constructive spirit with the problem of biblical criticism, a work like Professor McGarvey's can be recommended as presenting some of the best reasons for the adoption of the views which he so strongly combats. (The Standard Publishing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. 1910, Pp. 479, $1.00 net.)

THE EXPANSION OF CHRISTENDOM. So much is written upon the theme of missionary work that one hardly knows what to read first of all the desirable books. Mrs. Ashley Carus-Wilson has contributed to the theme a most serviceable book, which deals with the progress of missionary work from the beginnings of the Christian era to the present time. The treatment is threefold. First there is the "Cause for Missions," which reviews the six great motives for missionary work; then "Course of Missions," which surveys the coming of the nations by the Christian faith, and lastly the "Crisis of Missions," which considers the present condition of the world-field and its imminent needs and changes. The style is pleasing and the material is full of the kind of information busy people wish in acquainting themselves with this important theme. (Hodder and Stoughton, London, 1910, Pp. 338, $1.50 net.)

THE KINGDOM IN PREPARATION AND FULFILLMENT. Thomas W. Phillips in this little pamphlet is trying to persuade his brethren that it is useless and wrong to pray the Lord's Prayer with its petition, "Thy kingdom come," because the kingdom already came at Pentecost and there is therefore no need to pray for it further. This was once a favorite view with some of our people, and Mr. Phillips can present quotations from Alexander Campbell, Isaac Errett and Professor McGarvey that either explicitly or by implication confirm his thesis. But the ground on which it is constructed is a mechanical view of the progress of the work of God in the world, and an erroneous identification of the kingdom of God with the visible church. These contentions have ceased to be convincing, because they fail to meet either the facts of Scripture or of Christian experience. (Standard Publishing Co., Cincinnati, 1910.)

MICHAEL SERVETUS. To most readers of church history the solitary fact known about Servetus is his condemnation and death at the hands of the authorities at Geneva, who were inspired by Calvin's strong detestation of the heresies with which he charged him. Professor Carl T. Odhner of the New Church Academy at Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania, has written a little volume in defense of Servetus, whom he praises as the one man of his period who was not carried away either by papal pretensions to authority or by Protestant doctrines of miraculous regeneration and polytheistic views of the Trinity. As Professor Ohdner is a Swedenborgian, the highest praise he can give to the subject of his monograph is that he closely resembles the leader of the church of the New Jerusalem. (Philadelphia, J. B. Lippincott Co. 1910, Pp. 95, 50 cents net.)

THE COMING RELIGION, by Charles F. Dole. An optimistic view characterizes this book, which is in itself good, but the statements are for the most part general, and one does not seem to get in a concrete way much closer to the desideratum of the author which he expresses as "good thinking, good feeling and especially good conduct." The trend of much of modern thought is brought out in one of the concluding paragraphs. "In short, everything forces upon us the conclusion that this is a spiritual universe, whose great values, forever lifting themselves above the dust and toil of life, are justice, beauty, truth and goodness. But a spiritual universe is another name for God's world, and the names of God are Power, Wisdom and Love." (Boston: Small, Maynard & Company, Pp. 200. $1.00.)

IN THE MASTER'S COUNTRY. Martha Tarbell, whose Sunday School commentaries have been among the most valuable helps for the study of the International lessons in recent years, has prepared a geographical aid to the study of the life of Christ which promises to be an admirable help in the work of teachers. It opens with a chronologically arranged outline of the life of Christ. Then follows the geography of Palestine in the time of Christ, covering such features as its position and extent, physical characteristics, climate, divisions, great highways and cities. An appendix contains several outline maps for practice work. (George H. Doran Co., N. Y., pp. 43, $0.50 net.)

THE TEACHING OF THE LESSON. G. Campbell Morgan prepares each year for Hodder and Stoughton of London and New York, a Vest Pocket Notebook on the International Lessons. The volume for 1911 has been received. Dr. Morgan is a conservative, but suggestive teacher of the Bible, and this little volume is compact and convenient.

CHRIST AND THE NATIONS. The argument for missions drawn from the material of the Bible is familiar and yet always impressive. Principal Arthur J. Tait of Ridley Hall, Cambridge, has reviewed the Old and New Testament teachings on this theme in a series of ten chapters which divide the Old and New Testament into periods of development and gather from each the most outstanding statements on the theme of world evangelization. It is not so compact or convincing a book as McLean's "Where the Bible Speaks," but it is a thoughtful presentation of its theme. (Hodder and Stoughton, London, 1910, Pp. 231.)

THE BEAUTY OF EVERY DAY, by J. R. Miller, D. D. In his introductory note to this new work, Doctor Miller says "These simple chapters may have their messages for new friends and old—those who have been reading the author's books for years, and those who may pick this volume up by chance." (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Company, New York. 65 cents, net.)

THE MASTER'S FRIENDSHIP, by J. R. Miller. Perhaps no writer on religious subjects is more widely read than this author. The keynote of this book is brought out in the first sentence, "Jesus was the friendliest man who ever lived in this world." (New York. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. Pp. 43. 50 cents.)

WAGE EARNING WOMEN, by Annie Marion McLean, Ph. D., Professor of Sociology in Adelphi College. Introduction by Grace H. Dodge. This is one of the series known as The Citizen's Library of Economics, Politics, and Sociology, edited by Prof. Ely of the University of Wisconsin. It was written by Miss McLean, who had charge of a corps of twenty-nine women in conducting the investigation. The work was done under the auspices of the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., and its president, Miss Dodge, writes the preface. It is the kind of work that commends such organizations and is a fine commendation of the worth and promise of the rapidly growing Young Women's Christian Association. Realizing that all their energy might have been spent in investigating thoroughly some single occupation, they chose rather to "learn a good deal about many women in various trades with a view to stimulating efforts in their behalf." To this end they studied a large number of such industries as the clothing, textile, laundry, cigar, box, soap, store, shoe, printing, paper-making, fruit-picking and drying, etc., that engage especially the labors of women operatives. They covered the country from Massachusetts to California and looked at matters from the standpoint of not only both the employer and employee but of others familiar with woman's work. They found things anything but cheering and recommend, among other things, especially that shorter hours and better wages, more sanitary conditions and better recreational facilities be provided. They found that one woman out of every five and over sixteen years of age is a breadwinner, and that the greater number of them work under conditions that does not bode well for the children that shall come after them. They most heartily approve of the labor union and find the women workers turning to it as a means of self-help. The Y. W. C. A. has been established at more than 400 industrial centers and is doing a work that cultivates comradeship, makes for moral sensibility and saves from menace to both body and soul. LABOR IN EUROPE AND AMERICA, by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor. Samuel Gompers is one of the remarkable men of this time. He has been for almost a generation at the head of the greatest labor organization in the world. He possesses those powers of organization that might have made him wealthy had he chosen business, or a great party leader, had he chosen politics. But he chose to devote his great talents to the uplift of that multitude into which he was born and who must labor with their hands for the wages other men may pay. He dreamed, when a young workingman, of the benefits that might be brought to the workers through a federation of the unions, and dared to prophesy, in his enthusiasm, that he would some day lead such an organization. Last summer he was sent by the Federation to attend the International Trades Union Conference in Paris and to act as a fraternal delegate at national conferences in other lands. Thus he is seeing his idea of a federation broadened into a world-wide bond of labor and advocates a strong international federation. He spent the summer studying general labor conditions in Europe. With his keen perception and experienced judgment he was able to learn more in a few short months than many an investigator could have discovered in a twelvemonth. He was received everywhere with honor among the labor leaders and given every facility they possessed for his study. The result is a book that reads as fascinatingly as a story or a travel tale, but is filled with things that it is good for the student of welfare problems to know. He found that conditions were improving in Europe, but that poverty was terrible among the working people, and that America is far in the lead as a workingman's country, due to the freedom of opportunity here to quit your job. To quit your job is not always an easy or possible thing to do, but there is a margin of such possibility in this country, while there is little there, and a man is born almost as if in a caste. (New York: Harper & Brothers. Pp. 286.)

THE FUTURE OF TRADES UNIONISM AND CAPITALISM, by Charles W. Eliot, President-emeritus of Harvard University. Not so much the logic of the situation as the trend of our sympathies determines our attitude on social questions. This is strikingly revealed in this little book of President Eliot's. His treatment of Trades Unions is chiefly devoted to pointing out their dangers, while that of Capital is devoted to extolling the virtues of paternalism if only capital would be so good as to adopt them. The worthy scholar and beloved President of Harvard writes in a fascinating style and beams with benevolence, but the type of paternalism he advocates would do the heart of Thomas Carlyle good. He declares the closed shop a labor monopoly and calls it the worst possible, but does not decry capital's claim to govern entirely the labor conditions, except as a salutary public opinion may deter it from a dictatorial attitude. He regrets that unionism has turned from "humanitarian" work to that of getting its wages raised, and says it has thereby forfeited public sympathy. He thinks the Australian method of arbitrating labor troubles bad becauses it recognizes the union as such and tells us that simple publicity is all that is needed to prevent capital from doing anything but what is right in its management of the wage system. In fact, publicity is Dr. Eliot's prescription for the curing of the troubles of the industrial world. He is a warm advocate of the Canadian method. His plea with capital is "be beneficent." That is capital's sole duty. Individual freedom is assigned as the reason for condemning industrial co-operation or collective bargaining. Combinations of capital, he claims, were the result of the necessity of meeting the rising combinations of labor. If ever sympathy made a great man a biased advocate of a cause, Dr. Eliot's individualism and faith in an economic overlordship of industry betrays it. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Pp. 122. $1.00 net.)

THE GROWTH OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD, by Sidney L. Gulick and Edward L. Gulick. This excellent little book is certainly not published for profit, else it would be sold for twice the sum. It is multum in parvo and is based on the previous volume of the same title by Sidney L. Gulick, one of the oldest and most honored of missionaries to the Japanese. But it contains many things not in the previous volume and is indeed a very epitome of the progress of humanity through the benevolent contributions of Christianity. The Kingdom of God is treated as that work of Christianity which makes for the betterment of humanity by means of brotherhood, benevolence, education, good conscience, morality, democracy and the work of social welfare. Excellent bibliographies are given for each chapter and many statistical tables and diagrams are supplied, showing the spread of "The Kingdom" numerically in its various contributions to human welfare. Statements are made in outline of the state of society before the coming of Christianity and a review is made of that part of church history which separated the church from its social work in the interests of theology and ecclesiasticism. It is a most convenient volume to have at one's elbow. (Boston: The Pilgrim Press. Pp. 221. 50 cents net.)

DEMOCRACY AND THE PARTY SYSTEM IN THE UNITED STATES, by M. Ostrogorski. After the publication of his "Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties," its bearing on present day political issues in this country made the publication of the present volume pertinent. The author made a long stay in America, studying the latest development in political methods, including the present administration. First considered is the Caucus Club of colonial times, then the establishment and evolution of the convention system to the complications of the political machine and the present struggle for emancipation from the tyranny of a political trust. The proposed reform measures are considered with discerning comment on their practicability and lack of it. The author says in closing, "The direction of the path of progress has to be rightly discerned, the feasible has to be distinguisshed from the utopian, but the magnitude of the task should never be a plea for its abandonment. It is rather only an additional reason for arduous work." (New York: The Macmillan Company, Pp. 455. $1.75, net.)

THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH, by William Allen White. It is interesting to read this work in connection with the one considered above, one written by a member of the Russian Duma, and a factor in its revolutionary political period, the other by an American, and imbued with the democratic spirit of the West. Mr. White begins with the declaration that the underlying sin is personal greed, and the problem of democracy to make business honest, tracing the development of organized capital, the awakening of public sentiment to the necessity of its control, the struggle each new moral issue must undergo before its acceptance, lest it disturb our preconceived ideas. The author handles the subject not with the rancor of the "muckraker" but with a kindly, optimistic spirit, looking forward to a democracy "not established by intricate laws and elaborate government machinery, but by the fundamental kindness of men to men, the basic unselfishness of man widened and applied to men, in their new relations." (New York: The MacMillan Company, Pp. 2666. $1.50, net.)

WAR ON THE WHITE SLAVE TRADE—Rev. Ernest A. Bell has been for many years the leader in the work of the Midnight Mission, which has carried on meetings in the Red Light district of Chicago in the effort to rescue girls from the life of sin and to save young men from the temptations of that part of the city. Recently a large amount of literature has been published dealing with the social evil, and in this volume Mr. Bell has collected papers from such workers in this field as Hon. Clifford G. Roe, formerly Assistant State's Attorney in Chicago, and now connected with the League for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic; Edwin W. Sims, Assistant State's Attorney, Dr. W. S. Hall of Northwestern University, and a number of others who are authorities upon the phases of the evil discussed. The book has many illustrations which help to understand the character, methods, and results of the social evil as it is met in a city like Chicago. (Charles C. Thompson Co., Chicago, pp. 481, $1.25.)

GOVERNMENTAL ACTION FOR SOCIAL WELFARE, by Jeremiah W. Jenks, Ph. D., LL. D. This volume is one of that excellent series edited by Samuel McCune Lindsay, as The American Progress Series. Other volumes are "The New Basis of Civilization," by Prof. Patten; "Standards of Public Morality," by Pres. Hadley; "Misery and Its Causes," by Edw. T. Devine, and "Social Insurance," by Henry Rogers Seager. The series is designed to give technical assurance to social workers and to make popular to the public the real basis of social welfare work. This volume of Prof. Jenks is quite up to his other works along the social line. It is perspicuous, judicious, full of heart, and does not "use words to conceal thought." After defining the meaning of social welfare he defines the prerogatives and limitations of the legislative, judicial and executive function under government in relation to social welfare work. He is not disposed to accept the creed of those who think government exists only to restrain the vicious, but believes it has a stewardship to discharge in positive action for social welfare and that its functions are progressive in their growth. Those who are impatient with the slowness of the government in dealing with wrongs that newly arise and the temerity with which constructive innovations are undertaken will profit by the discussion of those elements of social psychology that deter such undertakings. The great laws of custom, of moral inertia, of prejudice, and the complex state of society are pointed out. On the other hand, the inhibiting interests of class and self interest are dealt with and the power of public opinion to compel legislation effectually shown. This book, and indeed the whole series, present the scientific basis for procedure in social welfare work as determined both by fundamental social laws and governmental prerogative. (New York: The Macmillan Company. Pp. 226. $1.00 net.)

PRIVILEGE AND DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA, by Frederic C. Howe, Ph. D., Author of "The City; The Hope of Democracy," etc. Dr. Howe is one of that newer class of writers who has made himself a name through his contributions to the literature on current issues of the fundamental type. This volume is so packed with facts and so rich in application to the burning issues of today that a reviewer cannot do more than describe it unless he has a page or two at his disposal. It is an able defense of the right of the masses to their own patrimony and a vigorous protest against the expropriation of the natural wealth of the nation by those who furnish the initiative and the capital for its development. He would give brains and brawn their just portions in the work of the world, but he denies that brain and money have a right to the unearned increment that gathers about enterprise through the contribution that population and progress make. That which society produces by its presence and by its collective acts, he believes society should have. He would have that wealth which nature provides, pay the cost of government and social welfare and give every man the untaxed earnings of his individual enterprise. He would give competition free scope where it can be guaranteed, but he would remove all natural monopolies from the domain of private profit. The whole volume is a ringing demand that individual enterprise shall be rewarded by the lawful fruits of its effort, but that it shall never be privileged to dispossess society of its natural gifts through any form of monopoly or legal privilege. In all cases of history "the class which ruled was the class which owned," but democracy demands that no class own the common wealth. "The open door, the open highway, the socialization of the land, will destroy the tribute exacted by monopoly." (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Pp. 304. $1.50 net.)

LATTER DAY PROBLEMS, by J. Laurence Laughlin, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Chicago, author of "The Principles of Money," etc. In this volume the well-known and able economist, Prof. Laughlin, discusses a variety of subjects, but one group center around the discussion of labor, wages and poverty and the other around banking questions. In all current problems are dealt with from a conservative viewpoint and "sentimentalists" come in for special derision. The treatment of the question of "The Abolition of Poverty" is a fair index to the temper of the whole volume. The author's fundamental maxim for the labor question is "increased efficiency." He thinks poverty can never be abolished because there is that in human nature which forbids some from ever enjoying much unless it is given them. Thus he sees nothing better than a chance to reduce poverty. This he would do by making it possible for every one who would be willing to move to the country to get on a bit of productive land. But he says nothing at all about any means of relieving them of excess rents such as a great country-wise movement would bring. For those who would not go to the country he would make technical instruction possible that all who would might become skilled laborers. He reasons as if increased productive power had no handicaps in our industrial system, but automatically does and forever will receive its share of the product. Labor unions he regards as the chief enemy of better wages and working conditions because they are "monopolies" and run for the benefit of the few (?). He denounces no other monopolies as obstructionists to the natural right of labor to procure its share of the general product. The principles of the whole treatment would have applied to the problems of a benevolent feudal lord with satisfaction and no doubt give eminent satisfaction as well to those who frankly believe in a feudalistic system of industry. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Pp. 303. $1.50 net.)

MASTERMAN AND SON. Dr. W. J. Dawson is the author of several works, of which perhaps the best known are "A Prophet in Babylon," "The Makers of Modern English," and "The Evangelistic Note." In the present book he has told in an interesting way the story of a hard-headed, unscrupulous, successful English architect who was anxious to secure the future of his son by making him a member of the important firm of which he was the head. But the son becomes distrustful of his father's business methods, discovers that many of the buildings put up by the company are unsanitary and shoddy, and refuses to connect himself with the business. The father who is only carrying out the ordinary methods of business in his set becomes irritated by his son's criticisms and at last practically casts him off. The boy comes to America and seeks his future in the Far West. The love story connected with the business of Masterman and Son is an interesting strand. The ending one must read for himself to properly appreciate. Doctor Dawson's style is simple and pleasant to read. A paragraph will illustrate features that are frequently in evidence: "The pivots upon which life moves consist of a few rare and exquisite moments; for one man a sunrise, for another a strain of music heard at midnight, for yet another the sudden, arrowy fragrance of violets in a wood, and behold! life is changed, something has been withdrawn from it and something added—a new element, wholly authentic, yet wholly indefinable." (New York: Fleming H. Revell. Pp. 365. $1.25 net.)

THE NEW DEMOCRACY, by Louise Downes. An exhaustive discussion of the "Votes for Women" problem. Many quotations from the Bible and Walt Whitman are used as texts, as it were, for somewhat figurative and not always clear treatment. The enfranchisement of woman is not to come as a gift from man, but as the necessary fulfillment of Law, which is above all human opinion. In one chapter the author says, "The terror of men today seems to be that they are being called upon to yield up their power to the opposite arm of their problems. They have no argument but, Woman ought not to usurp authority belonging to men. The negro will usury the power of the white man. Labor will dominate capital. Japan will dominate America. Fear of the opposite arm of all problems possesses men today," and again, "The problem of the emancipation of woman is no human political one. This is a problem of the ascension of life. No man problem, but a problem in which is evolved the fall or ascension of the world." (Boston: Sherman, French & Company. Pp. 420. $2.00 net.)

THE STEERING WHEEL, by Robert Alexander Wason. "All the world's a car, and all the men and women would-be chauffeurs," is the delicate paraphrase that appears on the title page and suggest the delicious humor that bubbles in an irresistible fashion throughout the book. The ludicrous and impossible sides of much of the modern so-called "Socialism" is held up to view in a good natured way, and at the same time there is shrewd commentary on present day business methods and motives. All the characters are well drawn and stand out with an individuality that makes them move through the pages with reality. (Indiannapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Company, Pp. 399, $1.50 postpaid.)

MY LADY OF THE SPUR, by David Potter. This is Mr. Potter's third novel, "The Last Goddess" and "The Eleventh Hour," having preceded it. The time of this story is the early days of America, and the style is reminiscent of "Merrie England," with much jousting with brigands, and all the accomplishments, of the life of that period, and recounts the adventures of a free lance, who steps into a dead man's shoes, and by assuming in reality the character of a gentleman of honor, clears himself of a former crime, and wins the love of the lady whose property he had annexed. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott. Pp. 329. $1.50).

A SPLENDID HAZARD, by Harold McGrath. This prolific writer of "best sellers," writes purely for the diversion of his readers, so it is said. There are no social problems in "A Splendid Hazard," and the story moves along on its well-oiled plot with no unpleasant creakings or harrowing episodes. While of the conventional type, there is rather a sweetness and vivacity about it that makes it good pastime for an afternoon's reading. Pictures in color, by Howard Chandler Christy, add to its attractiveness. (Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.50 postpaid.)

THE GOLDEN GALLEON, by Lucas Malet. A reminiscence of Mrs. Gaskell's Cranford is in this little bit of human history. The devotion of "Other Auntie" and "Auntie My" to Willy Evans, who personified life and youth to them, tells the power of our ideals to raise us above the sordidness of immediate environment,—the alchemy that can "Life's leaden metal into gold transmute." (New York: Hodder & Houghton. Pp. 151. $1.20 net.)

PAYING THE PIPER, by Margret Holmes Holmes Bates. "Remember your sins will find you out," might be the summing-up of this story of New York life. Many types of character figure in its pages, some admirable, others decidedly the reverse, and the tragical ending of the book seems an unavoidable sequence in the logic of its happenings. (New York: The Broadway Publishing Company. $1.50.)

Miscellaneous

THE SCIENCE OF POETRY AND THE PHILOSOPHY OF LANGUAGE, by Hudson Maxim. It is a far cry from torpedoes to trochaic inversions, yet the versatility of the author makes him seem equally at home in either field. There is a vivid quality in the style that is reminiscently dynamic as it were, of the author's inventive genius in the field of explosives. Especially is this true, where he launches into humorous criticism of the critics, who have descanted on this subject in other generations. On the whole, Mr. Maxim has given us an exhaustive, discriminating review of what poetry is not, as well as what it is. The book is replete with specimens and examples, to give clarity to the text, and not the least interesting of these are Mr. Maxim's own flights into the realm of poesy, though he modestly designates them as "exemplifications of what any educated person with imagination and powers of invention may write by merely proceeding according to scientific method and without any fine frenzy or divine afflatus." (New York: Funk and Wagnalls Company. Pp. 294. $2.50 net.)

GREAT ENGLISH NOVELISTS, by Holbrook Jackson. Eleven representative English writers appear in this volume, which is third in a series which Mr. Jackson is compiling. They range from Defoe to George Meredith, who, as the author says, represents the adultage of the novel. The personal sketch of each writer is not so much of a biographical nature, as an interpretation of his life and its consequent relationship to his work in its main tendency and ideal. (Chicago: The Book Supply Company. 75 cents, net.)

THE UNCROWNED KING, by Harold Bell Wright. In this book, Mr. Wright has made a distinct departure from the books that have given him wide-spread popularity and established in the "best sellers" class, yet there is a reminiscence of the underlying thought in "The Shepherd of the Hills," and "The Calling of Dan Mathews." The story is allegorical, and the journey of the Pilgrim from the Desert of Facts past the Outer Edge of Things to the Land of Allthetime, where the rightful ruler Really Is for awhile usurped by the pretender Seems-To-Be, is an analogy of the journey of the human consciousness from sense to soul, from the materialistic and limited sense of things to the awakening to the reality of the spiritual

THE NORTH POLE, by Robert E. Peary. This is one of the notable books of the year. In his introduction to the volume, Theodore Roosevelt says, "Commander Peary has made all dwellers in the civilized world his debtors; but above all, we, his fellow Americans, are his debtors. He has performed one of the great feats of our time; he has won high honor for himself and for his country; and we welcome his own story of the triumph which he won in the immense solitudes of the wintry north. Contrary to popular impression, the book is by no means a mere reprint of the magazine articles, as much interesting matter has been added. There are more than a hundred illustrations selected from the 1,500 negatives in Commander Peary's possession. Eight of these are in full colors. The terse, graphic style of the whole narrative makes it intensely interesting reading. This book will be published, it is believed, in more countries and languages than any other book of 1910. It has already been announced in England, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Sweden and Holland. It is possible there will be editions in Hungary and other negotiations are pending. Interest in the book has everywhere been exceedingly keen, and the arrangements with foreign publishers correspondingly favorable. Even in some countries where no copyright protection exists, publishers have gladly paid for the privilege of bringing out the authorized edition. (New York, Frederick A. Stokes Co., 365 Pp. $4.80, net. Special de luxe autograph edition, $15,00, net.)

THE SECOND POST, by E. V. Lucas. Those who enjoyed the delightful collection of letters published under the title of "The Gentlest Art," have another treat in store in a second volume, in which Mr. Lucas has assembled these most personal memoirs of more than one generation. From the letters of Pliny the Younger in the first century to the irrepressible commercial traveler, who tactfully inquires after a French leave of absence, "Dear Firm:—Am I still with you?" there is much to entertain one. (New York: The Macmillan Company, Pp. 262. $1.25 net.)

THE BOOK OF FRIENDSHIP, by Samuel M. Crothers. The gentler sentiment of friendship finds expression in this compilation of prose and poetry from many authors. From the friendship of childhood, on through college days, to the riper friendship of mature years, are recorded the expressions of feeling that are imperishable. Mr. Crothers says in an introductory word, "A friend is one whom you like to have with you when you are doing what you most like to do . . . In the consciousness that another reflects your thought, you find the keenest satisfaction." (New York: The Macmillan Company. Pp. 331. $1.25 net.)

SIEGFRIED, by Oliver Huckel. The usual Wagnerian librettas are most inadequate from a literary standpoint, being made rather to suit the musical requirements so that much of the spirit of the stirring German legends are lost. Dr. Huckel has given a free translation in blank verse that presents the life and color of the original. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Company. Pp. 105. 75 cents net.)

WALDEN, by Henry D. Thoreau. Lovers of Thoreau will find much enjoyment in the new edition of "Walden" which is one of the most attractive of this season's "old favorites in new dress." Clifton Johnson has prepared special photographic illustrations, thirty-five in number, for it. These include a number of views of Walden Pond, and other points about Concord that are associated with the author. In the light of the much discussed "increased cost of living" of today, many of the ideas set forth in the book are most pertinent. One cannot help but see the folly of continually making additions to one's household goods which can, by a slight change, become household "gods" to whose unwholesome tyranny we must pay exacting tribute with our time and strength. To be sure, we cannot all build us a hut in the woods and live close to Nature, as did this kindly philosopher, but we can keep ourselves from being entirely blinded by the fog of Things, and see the uselessness of "spending the best part of one's life earning money in order to enjoy a questionable liberty during the least valuable part of it." The illustration shows the cairn of stones that marks the original site of Thoreau's hut, which is made

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

[Those who have found help in the devotional exercises of the Daily Altar during the past year are asked to read the editorial note on page 5 and write the editors whether they wish the department continued into next year.—THE EDITORS.]

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 4.

Theme for the Day.—The Prayers of the Saints.

Scripture.—Pray without ceasing.—1 Thess. 5:17. Continuing steadfastly in prayer.—Rom. 12:12.

And another angel came and stood over the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should add it unto the prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne.—Rev. 8:3.

Faint not before the unseen throne,
O wrestling soul that lifts thy prayer
'Gainst pendent clouds in vacant air,
Thou makest not thy plea alone.

A vial full of odors sweet,
A chosen angel's sacred trust,
The broken cry that rose from dust
With "incense much" becomes complete.
—Rev. J. M. Laird ("The Petitioner")

Prayer.—O Thou, who art unseen but ever near, we offer Thee our thanks for this new Lord's day. Our faith grows stronger and our hope revives at the thought of the house of God, and the fellowship of Thy people. We would draw near to Thee in worship today, and gain a firmer hold upon the life to come. And may prayer become a more precious privilege, bringing us to the presence chamber of the King. May the lifting up of our prayers be like the morning sacrifice. In Jesus' name, we ask. Amen.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5.

Theme for the Day.—The Coming of the Snow.

Scripture.—Great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend. For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth.—Job 37:5, 6. He giveth snow like wool; he scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes. He casteth forth his icelike morsels: who can stand before his cold?—Psa. 147:16, 17.

The snow had begun in the gloaming,
And busily all the night
Had been heaping field and highway
With a silence deep and white.

Every pine and fir and hemlock
Wore ermine too dear for an earl,
And the poorest twig on the elm tree
Was ridged inch deep with pearl.
—James Russell Lowell ("The First Snowfall")

Prayer.—Our gracious God, in Thy hands are all the forces of the world. We know that behind and within all nature Thou art working out Thy holy will. We rejoice in the new ways in which Thy providence is made known. For the coming of the winter, for the snow that wraps the world in its folds, for all the quiet ways in which the great purposes of nature go forward through the months, we praise Thee. Only make us quick to hear the cry of need, and earnest in all friendly offices toward the poor about us. For Thy names's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6.

Theme for the Day.—Open the Door.

Scripture.—Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.—Rev. 3:20.

Open the door of your hearts, my lads,
To the angel of love and truth;
When the world is full of unnumbered joys,
In the beautiful dawn of youth.
Casting aside all things that mar,
Saying to wrong, depart!
To the voices of hope that are calling you,
Open the door of your heart.
—Edward Everett Hale ("The Open Door")

Prayer.—Our lives are Thy gift, good Father, and into them Thou comest as we give Thee room. We have heard the entreating words of our Lord, asking us to receive him in Thy name, for he comes to speak to us of Thee. May we not set barriers before the entrance of our hearts, but open to Thee and to all holy guests. Abide with us, dear Lord, and leave us not, for the day is far spent, and the night is at hand. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7.

Theme for the Day.—The Treasures of Books.

Scripture.—Then read Baruch in the book. Jer. 36:10.

The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, bring when thou comest, and the books, especially the parchments.—2 Tim. 4:13.

Who hath a book
Hath but to read,
And he may be
A king indeed.
His kingdom is His inglenook;
All this is his
Who hath a book.
—Wilbur D. Nesbit ("Books")

Prayer.—We bless Thee, O Lord, for all the friendships with which our lives have been enriched. And among these companions of ours that have made the days inspiring are those who have spoken to us in the pages of our books. We have Thy word in our hands, and many other volumes that have brought us the breath of life, and girded us anew for our daily tasks. Make such friendships increasingly dear to us, O our God, and through their help may we become worthy of enrollment in the Book of Life. Amen.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8.

Theme for the Day.—Troubles that do not come.

Scripture.—Be not therefore anxious for the morrow.—Matt. 6:34.

In nothing be anxious; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus.—Phil. 4:6, 7.

Some of your hurts you have cured,
And the sharpest you still have survived.
But what torments of grief you endured
From evils that never arrived.
—Ralph Waldo Emerson ("Anxiety")

Prayer.—Father of mercy, Thou hast saved us from many dangers of the way. We have trusted Thee, as our fathers did, and Thou hast not failed us. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the troubles that our fears alone make real. Give us faith to rely on Thy arm of power, and to put out of our souls all fear and misgiving. Then shall we be saved from most of our anxieties, which are for ills that never come. Give us the calmness and the serenity of Jesus, our Lord, in whose name we pray. Amen.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9.

Theme for the Day.—The New World.

Scripture.—Behold, I make all things new.—Rev. 21:5.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind.—Isa. 65:17.

Let dead hearts tarry and trade and marry,
And trembling nurse their dreams of mirth,
The while the living their lives are giving
To bring the bright new world to birth.
—William Morris ("The Voice of Toil")

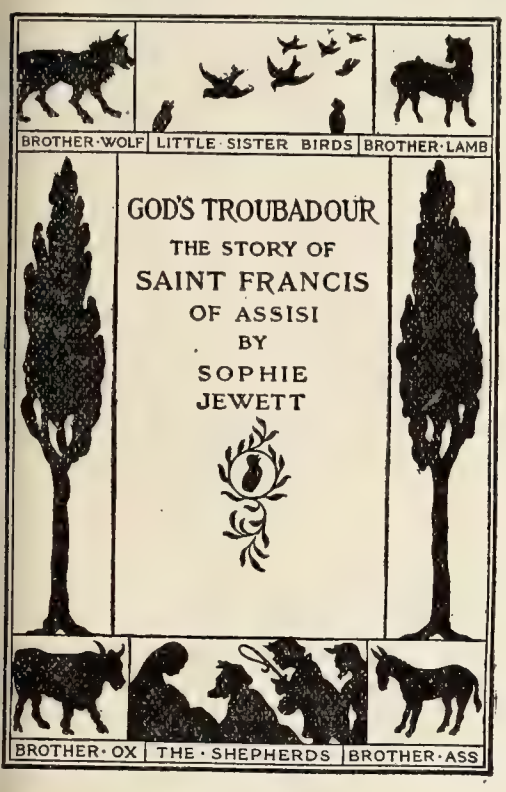
Prayer.—Our confidence is in Thee, O Thou Savior of the lost. We live in a world much of which is evil, and we find that same evil in our own hearts. But we would share in the glory of bringing in a new world in which dwelleth righteousness. Count us worthy of such a task, O our Father. Let us not fail of our high calling as Thy children. Lighten our way before us, and hearten us for whatever effort may be required. And at last may we see the day dawn upon a world that is all Thine own. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10.

Theme for the Day.—Perverters of Good.

Scripture.—Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter.—Isa. 5:20.

O purblind race of miserable men,
How many among us even at this hour
Do forge a lifelong trouble for ourselves
By taking true for false, or false for true.
—Alfred Tennyson ("Geraint and Enid")



Prayer.—Holy Father, we acknowledge our proneness to err from the right way. We have followed too much the devices of our own hearts. We have too often perverted the good, and misnamed evil and sin. Count us not in the company of the unrighteous, but set our feet again in straight paths for Thy mercy's sake. And now bring us to the end of this week with Thy favor upon us, and hold our hands as the shadows fall. Amen.

—John LaFarge, the noted author and artist who died last week at the age of 75 years, was prominent in the world of art for many years as a versatile painter. He was born in New York City, March 31, 1835, and studied drawing with his grandfather, Binsse, a miniature painter. In 1856 he went abroad and in Paris studied as a pupil of Couture In 1860 he married, at Newport, R. I., Miss Margaret Perry, a great-granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin. For the making of stained glass windows he invented new methods, which became known in Europe as "American," and which reformed the art of glass staining, so highly developed in the middle ages but subsequently fallen into comparative mediocrity. Much of the work of La Farge is in churches and private residences in the large cities and churches of the land.

A CHILD'S GUIDE TO READING, by John Macey. "The larger part of the books discussed in the various chapters and included in the supplementary lists were written for adult readers." It is the author's conviction that what is good for adults is best for boys and girls, and he does not think much of "juvenile books." The title of the book would therefore better be "A Guide to Reading," and a note could have been made in the preface of the fact that it was a guide for children as well as for adults. The lists of books of fiction, poetry, biography and the rest seem to be judiciously made in view of the writer's conception of his task. Such lists are always suggestive and stimulating. (New York. THE NARRATIVE BIBLE, edited by Clifton Johnson. While the phraseology of the Bible has for the most part been preserved, the various stories of the Bible are told in a connected way, to preserve their interest for readers up to the age of perhaps fifteen years. AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Cross of Christ*

The Passover of A. D. 50 was the occasion of the greatest tragedy in the world's history. The death of Jesus from every point of view seems the most pathetic of events. To bring a life of such nobility and sacrifice, such friendship and good will, to an end so painful and shocking seems a violation of every law of economy. Those who witnessed the event must, for the most part, have felt how distinct a violation of justice it was. And no less have the centuries looked back with disapproval upon the taking of an innocent life by unjust accusation and the perversion of law.

The crucifixion of Jesus has maintained a conspicuous place in the thought of the church. At first it was an event which the disciples felt to be so little in keeping with their hopes of the Messianic kingdom that they avoided the theme, and based their proclamation of the gospel on the more convincing fact of the resurrection. Yet soon they came to see that the death of Christ was also strikingly valuable as an element in their message. It was a singularly effective appeal to the human heart, when presented with the passion of those who had loved their Lord and were deeply affected by the injustice of his taking off. It is not too much to say that no fact of the gospel has been so central and commanding in the theology of the church as the death of Christ.

The Crucifixion in Art.

On the aesthetic side it is undoubtedly true that the Cross has been given a prominence quite out of proportion to its real meaning. The painters of the Middle Ages loved to depict the agony of Christ at the crucifixion. The morbid sentiments of that age, with its excessive other-worldliness, found pleasure in the depiction of the horrors of that scene. Perhaps it was inevitable that this should be emphasized during the ages which understood so little of the value of Christ's life and teaching, as over against the fact of his death. Happily the modern church, with certain notable exceptions, has ceased to feature the crucifixion as a theme of sacred art. It has learned that the more normal aspects of the life of Christ have greater significance for the building of character.

There is little need that we should repeat that pathetic and tragic story here. It is impossible to let the mind dwell upon the horrors of Jesus' physical suffering or the shameful humiliation through which he was compelled to go, without stirring the deepest feelings of anguish in any sensitive soul. It is not by such methods that the fact of Jesus' sacrificial death is best appreciated. Certainly the more shocking aspects of that terrible event we may well try to forget, in order that the significance of the whole series of experiences through which our Lord passed may make their legitimate appeal to heart and will.

Whose was the Sin?

We cannot avoid asking the question, Who was responsible for the death of Jesus? On whom is the blame for that tragedy to be laid? The various actors in that drama were the people, Judas, Herod, Pilate, the Scribes and Pharisees, the chief priests and Jesus himself. It is evident that the people were but slightly involved in the matter. On nearly every occasion they showed themselves his friends. In Galilee they had been enthusiastic followers of his ministry. On the day of the triumphal entry they hailed his advent to the city with high expectations of his becoming king. With his condemnation and death they had almost nothing to do. The crowd that echoed the denunciations of the Scribes and priests was not made up of the people of Palestine, but was rather the Jerusalem mob, the lowest elements of the city rabble, easily stirred to hostility upon the suggestion of unscrupulous men.

The Jewish people have too long been charged with the crime of Jesus' death. The nameless brutalities inflicted upon them in Germany, Poland and Russia, to say nothing of England itself in earlier generations, have been based upon the race prejudice growing out of the false and malicious charge that they were accountable for the death of our Lord. No wonder the Jews of many lands connot listen to the name of Jesus without feelings of execration, considering the awful injustice heaped upon them by men who call themselves his followers.

The Part of Judas.

Judas was responsible for the death of Jesus in some small way. His motives in covenanting with the priests for the delivery of the Lord into their hands we shall perhaps never know. Was he disappointed at the Master's failure to take advantage of his opportunity? Was he merely greedy of the small price he was to receive? Was there some other element of pique or disappointment that we do not understand? His conduct remains one of the mysteries of that tragedy. But no one can suppose that his action was the result of hatred or a wish to prevent the accomplishment of Jesus' plans. His awful remorse and suicide are sufficient to disprove such a view.

But the part he played in the transaction, though inexplicable to the other disciples, was in reality very small. Had he never offered his services, other means would have been found to secure the person of the Master. In fact, the service he rendered in pointing out Jesus to the temple police amid the shadows of Gethsemane was almost insignificant. Judas will bear the brand of the traitor to the end of history, but his share in the actual events that brought Jesus to his death was very small.

Herod and Pilate.

Nor was Herod in any important way involved in the matter. To be sure he used the occasion as a means of renewing his friendship with Pilate, but as a factor in the death of Christ he was of no importance. Pilate, of course, played a much more important role. It was in his power to save the man whom he knew to be innocent. But he had no special concern for him, wher as his own position was in imminent dang if he awakened the hostility of the Jerusale circle. The danger of popular uprisin among the Jews was too serious and the i stances too numerous to be disregarded. I doubt Pilate would have preferred to follo the clear path of justice. But he was valiant defender of the right, and he took t easiest course in dealing with the perple ing situation. It must be confessed that did what almost any other Roman govern would have done in the like circumstanc The life of an accused man was a small m ter, while the tranquility of a province w of the greatest moment. Pilate's share the transaction from the official point view was not of great moment.

When one comes to the scribes and Pha sees it is easy to see that they are the ch actors in this tragedy. Their authority h been challenged by Jesus; their popular had been in danger; their interpretations the law had been discounted, and their cre undermined. To them Jesus was noth less than a dangerous heretic, a disturber the peace, whose suppression must be cured at all hazards.

Closely joined with them in the final is were the chief priests. The two groups w ordinarily the most violent rivals and ant onists. The priests were the official lead of the temple service. They were the own of the rich temple franchises. They only contempt for the minute definitions the scribes and Pharisees. But in the p ence of the common danger, especially a the cleansing of the temple, they joi forces, and determined upon the death Jesus as the only solution of the probl which his public ministry had presen Upon them must lie a large part of the l den or responsibility. They stopped at n ing to rid themselves of a dangerous r The world will hold them responsible fo large share in that awful event.

Jesus' Share.

And what of Jesus himself? Looking the straightforward, unswerving adher to his program, was there any other i than that of death? Jesus set his face ward that supreme witness to the t which was to do more to make it the wo possession than any other testimony c have accomplished. Like a martyr, he w forward unhasting, unresting, to the cons mation of his task at the cross. We ca tell what the results would have been i had survived and lived on to proclaim illustrate his message in Palestine and regions beyond. We only know that in providence of God he went to death. All circumstances seem to point inevitably this result. Roman suspicion and impati Pharisaic and Scribal jealousy, Saduccean ger, and the unbending purpose of Jesu make clear proof of his ministry, combine make inevitable the result of which his knows. It was the only way. The deat Jesus compelled the world to stop and t of the meaning of his life. Without life, the death would have had but meaning. Without the death, the life not have claimed the world's attention regard. By his death Jesus gave convi attestation to the facts of his ministry message. And therefore at the Cros Christ the nations must stand, as Greek

The New Ministerial Relief Proposition

Which You Are Invited To Help Solve

In coming to the Third Lord's Day in December of each year, we come not to the observance of an important day, as we have sometimes said, but we come to the consideration of an important ministry. To a proposition confronting the church as one of her very grave, but certainly neglected duties. And we are coming as we believe in the right spirit for the proper adjustment of an important matter. Fifteen years of wrestling with our Ministerial Relief work has had its educational value. We have had some profitable experience out of which comes understanding and determination.

The purpose now is to do what we should have been cheerfully doing for the past ten years. What every well-informed person in the brotherhood will say is right and ought to be done. What every well-disposed, sympathetic disciple will be glad to help do. What is absolutely necessary for us as a people to do, or bear the criticism of insincerity; and the reproach of indifference. Our claim is to New Testament teaching and practice, but if we look back over the last fifteen years of our history, as it pertains to our Ministerial Relief work, we will find in this we have not made good our claim. We have not been too much taken up with other interests, but we have been too indifferent toward this interest. We need to more evenly balance our considerations. As a great fact, the heart of our people is always in the right place. No worthy cause properly presented will ever fail a response. The one question upon which the support of this work hangs is its presentation to the people. And the logical channel is through the minister, with any and all other agencies assisting him. It is true of this as of any other general interest of the church, the minister holds the key to the situation. And through the ministers presenting this work to their people, we want to reach the hearts of at least a thousand new contributing churches this year.

OUR ONE DOLLAR A DAY CAMPAIGN

Our Ministerial Relief work is a challenge to the dignity of our ministry and to the integrity of the whole church. It is the payment of a debt required by the principles and spirit of our religion. It waits upon our ministry for its proper place among the important general interests of the church, and upon a great brotherhood for the support our Lord ordained it should have. Here is a man and his wife with a thirty to fifty years' record in the ministry. Their lives have been clean, consecrated. Their ministry efficient. They made many sacrifices for the cause they loved. Their active labors are closed. They have no home, no children to help them, and are without means of self-support. Such we consider among our truly worthy and most needy. The Board of Ministerial Relief feels that is the least amount that can be regarded as support for such faithful servants. True, we have never yet paid any of them one-half so much, but even this will not furnish them with more than the necessaries of life. And at least, this much the case demands, this much the church owes them, and this much we ought to pay. Others with homes, and possibly a little income, will receive less. The preacher with no wife, but who may have children to give him some assistance, to receive still less. Widows to receive the same consideration, and to be supported accordingly. Where there are dependents, as in some cases there are, this fact also will enter into the adjustment of the matter. Thus figuring, on a list of annuitants equal to that of last year, it will require about $25,000 a year to care for this work. Considering numbers and ability, this is but a pittance for the Disciples of Christ to give for the support of a work like this. We can, we ought, and Brethren, we must do it. And so to this end we have entered upon this and in which we are determined to win. There is no reason why we should longer trifle with this proposition in the half-hearted way we have been doing, but every reason why we should at once and without further delay meet the demands of the work as becometh the followers of Christ. Let no one think, "Well, there will be somebody to look after them. They will not starve." However this may be, you have heard the call; can you say no and regard yourself a brother of the Christ? Can you say no and then ask your Father to help you? Make your contribution with your congregation, if it makes an offering, but if it does not, then send direct to the Board. The care of these old soldier-saints is one of the church's first duties, and ought to be one of her delightful privileges. So let us have the joy of a pull altogether and put this matter in its proper place among the great interests of the church. Brethren, let us join in the determination that

THIS CAMPAIGN SHALL SUCCEED

This proposition is worthy the Disciples of Christ as a people pleading for a present realization of New Testament Christianity. The justice of the proposition appeals to our very best reason, and the obligation it lays upon us to our highest sense of honor. The proposition is not beyond our reach. It is not more than our Lord expects of us. It is not more than we ought to expect of ourselves. As one of the interests beyond local boundaries it claims first place in our hearts. As a matter of absolute necessity it demands our most earnest and careful consideration. As a long neglected duty it challenges the self-respect of every member of the church. It appeals to the judgment of men, the sympathy of women, and to all by its tenderness and the love that binds us together as brethren in Christ.

If we were to recite all the individual cases of need calling for consideration, we would have to include all our annuitants, though some are more needy than others. And we tell you brethren, that among those whose names are on our annuitant list, are some of the noblest spirits, cleanest lives, and most consecrated workers our Lord ever called into His service. Men whose lives were laid a full and complete sacrifice upon the altar of the gospel ministry, and whose devotion to duty and sacrifice for the cause of Christ form no insignificant part of the record that graces the pages of our history. There is only one attitude for us to assume toward these fellow-laborers with our Lord, and that is the attitude of brethren, which means sympathy and support. The two sides to this question are its needs and our integrity, and these meet only in the support for which we are pleading.

Now for an offering worthy the plea, worthy the people, and worthy the cause. Let Third Lord's Day in December mean Ministerial Relief to all our churches, and let us begin now to do what we have so long neglected. We will be pleased to send you literature for distribution and envelopes for the offering if you will indicate on a postal card how many of each you can use. Take hold of the matter in earnest and make your church a "Living Link Supporter," by the contribution of at least One Hundred Dollars. This can be done in hundreds of churches without difficulty, if you say so. Put your church on this list. Take the offering without fail. Make your exchange payable to BOARD OF MINISTERIAL RELIEF, and mail at once to 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Indiana.

Christian Endeavor

TOPIC DECEMBER 11.

How Must a Christian be Different from Others? 2 Cor. 6:14-18.

The first thing which must distinguish a Christian from other people is that he has made a public declaration of his faith in Christ and has dedicated his life to his service. He not only believes in his own inner consciousness that Christ is worthy of his discipleship, but he believes it with earnestness and wishes to declare it to all the world. Of course, it is frequently contended that one can be a Christian without joining the church. That statement is misleading. Rather what is meant is that joining the churche is no guarantee that one is a Christian. That is true. But he who has a stirring conviction that in Jesus Christ we have the true life—the ideal that will bring the individual into vital and harmonious relation both to man and God, and that this best expresses itself in everyday life in unselfish service and that he who wishes to participate in that life, i. e., to acquire this in the development of his own character, could not be kept out of the church. He believes in Jesus and he believes in the church of Jesus as the best instrument with which to work out his Christian purpose and he therefore declares his conviction to the world and co-operates with the other disciples through the agencies of the church.

The Christian differs from other people in the purpose and ideals of his life just so far as others differ from Christ. The difference is not in the physical appearance, nor yet in the particular actions of a Christian and a non-Christian man as they walk down the street. The non-Christian man may be sober and civil, polite and courteous. The difference is first seen in the great life purposes of the two. The non-Christian may lead a fairly respectable and sober life, work hard, rear a respectable family, conform to custom, accumulate and get such enjoyment as he is able. Of such men we have thousands to-day. In many respects the life and deeds of the Christian are the same, but upon inquiry as to the great life-ideals he is concerned not with the immediate personal enjoyment, but that his own life may conform to strict justice in his personal relation to his fellow-men. He strives to bring his life into conformity with the will of God. The thoughts that flash through his brain, the words which fall from his lips, and the deeds done in his attempt at the realization of his life purposes are determining factors with his Heavenly Father.

And finally the Christian becomes a "sweet savor of Christ unto God, in them that are saved, and in them that perish." Of course, to all those who spurn the appeal to know God and to make the life conform to His will, to those who are content to seek the immediate gratification of personal desires, whether they be that of physical appetites, or the personal enjoyment of ease and comfort, the fellowship of family and a narrow circle of personal friends and acquaintances, the acts and deeds of the earnest disciple is foolishness. His activity is an offense of him who is perishing—a stench in his nostrils. But to him who hears his appeal of unselfish service, who allows this rescuer to lead him up from the moral quagmire into which he has fallen, into the moral and spiritual gardens where the pretty rose and pure lily give forth of their fragrance, he is an angel of mercy. To this one he becomes a source of life. The great difference, then, between the Christian and other people is the broad gauged unselfish life of service that he lives in the fear of God as over against the narrow selfishness of others.

No Alum, No Phosphate of Lime

Foreign Society Notes

The Chicago brethren have just given a special offering of $1,500 for the work of the Congo. This is in addition to the regular offerings of the churches for Foreign Missions. This money is to go to the new station at Lotumbi. Mrs. Dye and your secretary were present on Tuesday, the 22nd of November, when this money was raised. Never have we seen such sacrificing loyalty on the part of the people. The women met in the afternoon and gave $214. Twenty-nine men from the various churches met for supper in a down-town restaurant. Following the luncheon, after talks by Mrs. Dye and your secretary, pledges were taken. The little group of men gave $1,300. Those who know the struggles of the Chicago churches will appreciate this loyal support. A year ago these people gave $1,000 in a similar special appeal to send out Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Smith to Africa. They expect to make this a yearly occurrence. The highest enthusiasm and joy prevailed while the money was being raised.

One of the most serious problems connected with the evangelization of the world is the education of the children of missionaries. Our senior secretary who is now in India, refers to a missionary who has just returned to the field after his usual furlough, and left three children in the homeland to enter school. The youngest was only seven years old, the oldest thirteen. The mother was almost broken-hearted. The real sacrifice for missions is measured, not by a few dollars given for the work, but rather by the heroic lives of those who have gone to the fore-front of the battle.

There is an excellent missionary home for tired missionaries and other Christian people at Colombo, Ceylon, conducted by Miss Annie S. Bishop and H. W. Hoy. It is located on Colpetty Road, not far from the harbor. It is a delightful place for those passi that way to stop for a day or night. The are also conducting an important missio among the seamen at that port.

As indicating the rapid growth of t foreign missionary interest among o churches in Australia it is interesting note that in 1905 they gave about $5,70 while in 1909 they gave about $13,000, more than doubled their gifts in four year The brethren in that country have done e ceedingly well. Their future interest a growth are assured.

Dr. L. F. Jaggard and wife made a trip the back country from Longa, Africa Lotumbi. This had never been done befo by any missionary. They were on entirel new territory, but everywhere received royal welcome, and were treated as king Mrs. Jaggard was a marvel to them. The people had seen white men before, but nev a white woman.

Herbert Smith of Lotumbi, Africa, report that thirty-two new persons have bee brought in by the evangelists to stud Christianity. The missionaries say that th land to which they have gone is very grea and there are many people dwelling ther They ask if they cannot take back twent or thirty teachers with them.

The Lord Jesus loves to reveal Himself t those of His saints who dare take the bleak side of the hill with Him. If you are willin to follow Him when the wind blows in you teeth and the snowflakes come thickly til you are almost blinded, and if you can say "Through floods and flames, if Jesus lead, I'l follow where He goes," you shall have such unveilings of His love to your soul as shal make you forget the sneers of men and th sufferings of the flesh. God shall make yo triumph in all places.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Does not the soul, finding the heart of it suffering full of joy, forget the mere rough outside in which that heart of joy was folded —Phillips Brooks.

C. L. Organ and C. M. Howe are now in a meeting at Delta, Ia., with promise of great interest. The Sunday-school had an enrolment of 264 on Nov. 20.

The work of tearing down the old church building at Sullivan, Ind., has begun, and the erection of a new $25,000 building will begin at once.

After a pastorate of fifteen years at Hannibal, Mo., Levi Marshall has accepted a call to Nevada, Mo., to succeed W. W. Burks.

R. H. Crossfield, president of Transylvania University, addressed the Ministerial Association of Muncie, Ind., on November 21, on "The Crisis in Ministerial Supply."

During the month of October, there were seventy additions at First Church, Dallas, Texas, at the regular services. J. E. Dinger is pastor there.

F. W. Burnham, pastor of First Church, Springfield, Ill., delivered an address on "Religion and Modern Manhood," to the Brotherhood at Whitehall, Ill., recently.

The meetings held at Muskogee, Okla., for the past four weeks by the pastor, Melville Putnam, have closed. About 150 have been added to the membership.

A series of lectures on the psychological, physiological and scriptural basis of the marriage are being given at Second Church, St. Louis, Mo., where R. E. Alexander ministers.

T. M. Thomas of Kansas, Ill., has accepted a call to Mattoon, Ill., to succeed D. N. Wetzel, who has removed to Covington, Ky. Mr. Thomas will begin his work January 1.

Austin Hunter began a meeting with his Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, Nov. 20, there being twenty-two additions on that day. Miss Una Dell Berry is assisting in the singing.

A new church to cost in the neighborhood of $15,000 is planned for Tillamook, Ore. At a recent meeting, about one hundred were added to the membership. V. E. Hoven is minister there.

C. A. Young continues his temporary pastorate at First Church, San Francisco, Calif. The work is progressing encouragingly, there being a number of additions at the regular services.

Central Church, Ironton, O., will hold a meeting in January. Since the beginning of the pastorate of Charles Arthur Cookwell, six months ago, the work has made good progress and the Sunday-school will reach the front rank standard Jan. 1.

The audiences at Lenox Avenue Church, New York, are large and enthusiastic. The pastor, Wm. Bayard Craig, believes in bringing to the latest discoveries of research in Bible history and is now preaching a series of sermons on "How We Got Our Bible."

The work is moving along well at Lathrop, Mo. Baxter Waters, the pastor, is preaching a series of sermons on "The Mind of Christ.' The subjects are as follows: "Jesus' Idea of God," "Jesus' Idea of Man," "Jesus' Idea of Sin," and "Jesus' Idea of Salvation."

At an enthusiastic meeting held recently at Bonham, Tex., where C. M. Schoonover ministers, eleven thousand dollars was subscribed in about as many minutes toward the erection of a new church to cost about $25,000.

Allen T. Shaw, pastor at Spencer, Ind., closed a two weeks' meeting at his church, November 20, with sixteen added. He was assisted in the singing by Edward McKinney, who is now in a meeting at Hartford City, Ind.

J. H. Gilliland and F. J. Held have closed a meeting at Nevada, Mo. The meeting was planned especially as a "school of instruction" for the church and the sermons and lectures took a deep hold on the thinking part of the community.

The oldest Disciple organization in Washington is at Elma, L. H. Mitchell being the present pastor. This church is in a prosperous condition, and is accomplishing much good by its influence. This congregation is planning to build a new parsonage in the near future.

James N. Lester, pastor of Highland Street Church, Worcester, Mass., has resigned his pastorate, to the deep regret of his congregation and returned to his former home in California. He will be succeeded by A. B. Cunningham, who has held a number of successful pastorates in Indiana.

The women members of the missionary society of Vermont Street Church, Quincy, Ill., tendered a reception recently to the various missionary organizations of the Protestant churches of the city. Each society made interesting reports, and timely suggestions for progressive work were made.

W. W. Burks will close a pastorate of five years at Nevada, Mo., on Jan. 1st. During this time, 519 members have been received into the church, which has grown spiritually under his leadership. Mr. Burks expects to do evangelistic work for the present, and will continue to reside at Nevada, Mo.

J. Newton Cloe, pastor at Greensburg, Kans., began a meeting at his church, Nov. 13, assisted by Miss Helen C. Shoecraft. The work has been progressing during the four months of Mr. Cloe's pastorate, and the Sunday-school is now in the front rank column.

The congregation at Ladonia, Texas, celebrated the fourth year of the pastorate of A. L. Clinkinbeard, by raising all the current expense deficit and parsonage fund, and starting a state mission offering. There is no more sincere way to express appreciation of a faithful ministry than in similar ways.

The news of the arrival of a fine boy at the home of Leslie W. Morgan, our English correspondent, is an event of more than domestic importance. With this re-inforcement Mr. Morgan's always interesting articles will, no doubt, now come more often and regularly than of late. Here's our hand over the sea!

The Christian Century is in receipt of an interesting looking handbill in Russian, which the accompanying letter tells us is an announcement of a stereopticon lecture given under the auspices of the Disciples' Missionary Union in New York. This organization conducts a school where the English is taught, and much good is being done among the foreign population.

O. F. Jordan, of Evanston, (Chicago) Church, is giving a series of Sunday evening sermons on great religious leaders. Martin Luther, John Wesley and Alexander Campbell being among them. A Young Men's Class in the Sunday-school, composed of associate and active members, is increasing in numbers and much interest is manifested in the present series of study, "The Prophets of Israel."

R. W. Abberley the English evangelist has closed a meeting of four weeks with B. H. Hayden at London, Ontario. Despite the illness of Mr. Abberley during part of the meeting, much good has been accomplished, there being thirty-three additions to the membership. The congregation is already planning to have Mr. Abberley lead in another meeting in the future.

B. A. Abbott, pastor of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, gave an address before the Disciples Ministers' Meeting recently on the subject, "The Preacher and the Modern Daily Paper." Mr. Abbott gave some interesting parallels between the calling of the modern

R. E. Booker has accepted the assistant pastorate at First Church, Los Angeles, California, with A. C. Smither. Mr. Booker has been with I. J. Spencer at Central Church, Lexington, Ky.

Good news continues to come in to the C. W. B. M. headquarters at Indianapolis, from the Jubilee Movement. Mrs. Harlan sends two telegrams in which all can rejoice with her. One is from Mrs. Henry Martin, state president of Arkansas, saying that the First Christian Church at Little Rock through its Woman's Missionary Society, became a Living Link last night for the work of the C. W. B. M. The other is from Cincinnati, announcing that the aim set by their auxiliaries at the Jubilee Rally in Cincinnati for the Jubilee Offering is $15,000.

Eureka College

Eureka College is compelled to go to court to protect her interests. A friend of the college a few years ago made a will leaving the college "the residue and remainder" of her estate. This amounts to something like $80,000. There is a contest filed against the estate and the matter is set for trial, in Springfield, Ill., Nov. 28. There is absolutely no ground for the contest. The claim is made that the woman lacked "testamentary capacity." If the woman who made this will was not perfectly sane and reasonable when she made it, it is evident that we will be compelled to build several more insane asylums in Illinois. This item of news we feel is necessary because it has been reported that Eureka College had come into possession of this estate valued at $80,000. It has not been counted as any part of the endowment fund we are raising. We have $75,000 raised besides this.

During the past week another friend of the college has passed away, leaving in her will $10,000 for Eureka College. This will have to stand for at least a year before the college can come into possession of it. It has not been counted, and will not be, as a part of our $125,000 endowment fund. During the past few days another friend of the college has written a will, leaving $22,000 to the college. This cannot be counted as a part of our $125,000 endowment fund.

The fact is, Eureka College has today more than $150,000 in bequests besides the $75,000 we have raised on our $125,000 proposition. This is the strongest argument in favor of the success of the present campaign. We need $50,000 more by Commencement to finish our present proposition: But, with its completion, the college will be out of debt,

An Original Year

By CHARLES E. JEFFERSON. Attractively printed in two colors. Decorative onyx boards. Price, 50 cents net. In ooze morocco. Price, $1.25 net.

THIS is another of Dr. Jefferson's delightful little booklets, keyed to the thought of the holiday season and yet equally suited to other seasons of the year, and especially to those times and moods when one feels the stirring of new hopes and ambitions. The ruling idea of this book is that it is possible to live in an old world, and go through substantially the same old experiences, day by day, and yet find ourselves constantly in a new world.

The Cap and Gown

By CHARLES REYNOLDS BROWN, author of "The Main Points," "The Strange Ways of God," "The Gospel of Good Health," "The Young Man's Affairs," etc. $1 net.

WRITTEN by a man who has been a college boy himself and remembers just how it feels. These pithy addresses will come straight home to the "joyous and confident company arrayed or about to be arrayed in 'cap and gown'" which the author addresses.

Underneath are the Everlasting Arms

By ALBERT J. LYMAN. Decorative boards, 50 cents net.

THE book abounds in trenchant sentences and illuminating passages. Here is his idea of faith: "Faith is a struggle towards certainty, or, in a practical way of putting it, Faith is the noble mental push, which even without the certainty of full vision, dares to swing off upon the weight of evidence."

What is Success?

By WALTER TAYLOR FIELD. Attractively printed in the unique Envelope Edition, 25 cents net.

MR. FIELD is not carried away by the popular conception that to amass a fortune or to have one's name in "Who's Who" is necessarily to have acquired success. This stimulating essay will do much to correct false estimates and create a desire for the genuinely worth while.

The Story of the American Board

By WILLIAM E. STRONG. Bound in cloth. 600 pages. Price, $1.75 net.

IT so happens that in this year 1910, when a new tide of foreign missionary interest is flooding America, the oldest foreign missionary society of the land, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, celebrates its centenary. There is therefore a double timeliness to this volume written by the Board's Editorial Secretary, in which the history of its first hundred years is briefly told.

Real Religion

By HOWARD A. BRIDGMAN, Managing Editor of The Congregationalist and Christian World. Crisp Brotherly Talks to the Average Man on Clean and Useful Living. About 200 pages; 75 cents net.

My Brother

By AMORY HOWE BRADFORD. $1.25 net.

THE book contains fifteen chapters, all concerned with the general question of Brotherhood in regard to differences of race, station, and wealth.

No Room in the Inn

By WILLIAM ALLEN KNIGHT. Attractively printed in two colors with Oriental border designs similar to "The Shepherd of Jebel Nur," but with different color scheme. Photogravure illustrations. 64 pages. Bound in vellum. Price, 50 cents net. In ooze morocco. Price, $1.25 net. Also in Unique Envelope Series, 25 cents net.

PROBABLY the most suggestive little book Mr. Knight has written since "The Song of Our Syrian Guest." This charming little story has been drawn from the leisurely days which Mr. Knight has been spending at Bethlehem, talking with the villagers, watching their life, gathering their folk lore of the Nativity.

One million copies of Mr. Knight's books have been sold.

The Great Assurance

By GEORGE A. GORDON. The author's deepest conviction concerning Jesus Christ. Price, 50 cents net.

BOUND in boards of blue onyx, with end leaves tinted in shades of blue. A graceful border incloses each page, and the general makeup of the book is characterized by taste and dignity.

A Man's Helpers

By WILFRED T. GRENFELL. About 100 pages. Bound in boards, 50 cents net.

A COMPANION volume to "A Man's Faith." There are three sub-divisions, "What the Bible Means to Me," "What Prayer Means to Me," "What Christian Fellowship Means to Me."

The Way of Prayer

Prayer in the Old Testament, Prayer in the New Testament, Prayer Today
By JOHN EDGAR MCFADYEN, B.A., Oxon., M.A., Glasgow, Professor Old Testament Literature and Exegesis, Knox College, Toronto. Bound in boards, 50 cents net.

A BRIEF but adequate and inspiring treatment of the function and value of prayer.

When Little Souls Awake

By HENRY TURNER BAILEY. Attractively printed in the Unique Envelope Edition, 25 cents net.

A SINGULARLY delicate and human portrayal by a discerning and sympathetic father of those great moments in a child's life when he begins to discover himself, his heavenly Father, and the riches of the world in which he lives.

Outline Studies of the Growth of the Kingdom of God

By SIDNEY L. GULICK, D.D., and EDWARD L. GULICK, M.A. Bound in boards with printed label, 50 cents net.

ADMIRABLY adapted to Adult Bible Class Work. The purpose of these studies is to point out some of the main steps in that growth in the past, and the main evidence of that growth in the present.

Church Work with Boys have $150,000 endowment and $150,000 in wills and bequests. If this isn't enough to move the friends of Eureka College to an intense activity during the next few months, I don't know what it would take to do it. At least $40,000 of these bequests have been written during the past two years as result of our Endowment Campaign. We cannot count this amount because our pledges must begin at once to draw interest at the end of the campaign. H. H. PETERS.

The Missionary Spirit and the Chicago Churches

These are days of great achievement among the Chicago churches in missions. During the recent Jubilee movement the ladies of the C. W. B. M. raised a special fund of two thousand dollars and announced that the total gifts from the Chicago churches to this society this year would be four thousand dollars. On Tuesday evening, Nov. 22, a little company of forty people from the various churches about Chicago met in a down town restaurant and raised a special fund of fifteen hundred dollars for the work of the new mission station at Lotumbi, Africa

This achievement would not be remarkable in many of the cities of our brotherhood. In Chicago, its significance arises from the fact that not over three of our churches are even comfortable in their finances and none of them are rich. We have five thousand Disciples identified with our churches. These are in about twenty-two different organizations. Almost every church is either building, or planning to build, or paying off a debt on a building. Running expenses are high in the city. The members themselves are for the most part gathered from the class that hopes to make a fortune rather than from those who already possess one.

The little meeting in the Faddis restaurant was one that will not soon be forgotten around Chicago. Secretary Stephen J. Corey was there to present the large considerations of missionary policy involved in the African situation. On a map were the locations of the stations on the Congo and its branches, Bolengi, Longa, Lotumbi, and Monyeka. The Belgium government has been exceedingly unwilling to grant new stations for Protestant mission work. Only the pressing necessity of having more medical work done got the grant of Lotumbi. The station was granted earlier than was expected and owing to the debt in the treasury of the society, the board cabled Dr. Dye that they could not enter. Then the missionaries in their heroism decided to divide up and hold the new station until reinforcements arrived. Mr. and Mrs. Smith, who were sent out by the Chicago churches with their money last year, though but newly arrived on the field, are holding the new station with the help of Mark Njoji, the native who recently visited this country.

The danger to Mr. and Mrs. Smith makes their act one of unusual missionary heroism. They are seventy miles from a doctor, with only a log canoe for transportation. Mrs. Smith has had the fever and is not strong. They have but little command of the language yet with which to cope with the natives.

Secretary Corey presented the significance of the Congo work as the bulwark against the Mohammedan invasion. The Mohammedan missionaries are sweeping down from the Soudan. Only a strong Christian nation like Uganda stretched across their pathway can stop them from taking the continent.

The condition of the society's treasury makes it necessary for this advance work to

AN APPRECIATION

In the time of great need the Chicago churches have come loyally to the rescue for the foreign work.. They have not stopped with generous contributions at the time of regular offerings, but they have rejoiced in doing handsome things in times of special emergency. Last year, when Dr. Dye returned to the Congo, there was great need that Herbert Smith and wife accompany him. The Society had no money to send them; so the Chicago people got together and raised $1,000 in cash. Recently the new station at Lotumbi, Africa, has been granted. It was feared it could not be held because of lack of funds. Again has help come in a crisis. At Topeka Chicago delegates pledged $1,000 for this emergency. On the 22nd a group of the men and women got together and raised $1,500. Those who understand the struggles these churches are undergoing in a great city, will know of the genuine sacrifice involved in this. The genuine joy with which the money was contributed was an inspiration. Again will the hearts of the brave toilers on the Congo be made glad.

in the Cure of Rheumatism

Electricity moves every muscle and performs every function of the Body and Brain. All the secretions and excretions are Electrical Processes. These facts are proved by Andrew McConnell through his Science of Human Electricity.

Electricity run into a muscle contracts it—the negative current expanding—the positive contracting, and it is the constant contraction and expansion of the vital organs which keep up their normal functions.

Take the stomach for example—it is the continual contraction and expansion of that organ which produces Peristaltic Action (churning movements) and prevents fermentation of the food. Again, the attraction from the blood of the elements which form the gastric fluids is an electrical process and does not exist when this power is not present.

Then take the intestines—it is their contraction and expansion which pushes the waste matter on and out of the system. Once recharge these organs with sufficient electricity and they function perfectly. There can be no further trouble from Constipation.

The Heart is an Electrical Pump—the positive current contracts that organ and forces the blood out and into the great arteries to circulate to the remotest parts of the body. The negative current expands the heart and draws the blood back into it through the veins. Thus the circulation is compelled to be poor and imperfect when these currents are not sufficiently strong.

A man's health and mental power are measured by the amount of Electricity in his body; low supply leading inevitably to sickness, and a return to the normal resulting in recovery.

The laws and methods for increasing and regulating the Electrical Production are successfully taught by correspondence and can be easily understood and practiced by everyone. Even the weakened invalid can soon recover normal health and the well man rapidly increase his working capacity. No drugs, apparatus, applied Electricity or mental suggestion are necessary.

Send for the "McConnell Researches in Organic Electricity," which prove that one can with the Electricity of his own body free himself from the verious forms of disease.

The proof that Electricity is the Life Power, and that it is possible for man to understand and use the laws by which it can be generated and controlled in the human body will bring a new era to mankind. Mr. McConnell has made a tremendous discovery which I think is bound to revolutionize science.

Your Friend--The Christian Century

When you think of your friends to whom you wish to make Christmas presents, do not forget your constant and intimate friend—The Christian Century.

We feel so secure in your affection that we make bold to suggest what gift would please us most. We do not ask you to buy anything for us. But if you would devote a little of your time and get a list of new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY it would please us more than any other thing.

And this is a gift in which we could reciprocate. Your own paper would be more valuable to you; and your friends whose subscriptions you received—think how they would be benefitted throughout the year!

Christmas time offers an ideal opportunity for all the friends of The Christian Century who have on many occasions expressed their appreciation in words to express it in a practical deed. You can help make a greater paper, if you will. Begin to talk with your friends now.

If you send a list of five or more you may have a good commission on each new subscription, if you wish it.

be done by a special offering turned into the treasury by January 1, if the work at Lotumbi is to be held.

Mrs. Dye was present. She is well known in the Chicago churches by this time. She made an address full of personal incident and explained in more detail the nature of the emergency. The society hopes to secure further grants as time goes along but should a backward step be taken after a grant was made, our people might expect no more favors from a government which is thoroughly committed to the pushing of the Catholic claim to this territory.

C. G. Kindred took charge of the raising of the money. It cannot be said that any money was "raised." It was freely given. In a quiet and matter-of-fact way the brethren talked over the need and the means at hand for meeting it. Nearly all of the giving was by churches, though some special individual gifts were made. It had been originally intended to raise a thousand dollars that evening. This amount was raised without any co-operation from some of our stronger churches like Englewood and Jackson Boulevard. When the situation became apparent to the meeting, it was thought by those present we should give fifteen hundred dollars. The chairman was inclined to protest raising such a large amount, whether in real earnest or to continue to delude brethren that they were really doing this thing themselves. The audience simply stayed and insisted upon giving the money. The last seventy dollars was made up with a flourishing of bills of small denomination by the audience for a few minutes.

The meeting closed with two short prayers and the singing of a hymn. Chicago had said for the "nth" time what she ever says in the presence of an urgent situation, "I will."

Some of us on the field here can hardly understand this quiet but remarkable missionary awakening. Perhaps it is the city which makes us feel great human problems. We see the problems of the mission field in some form in our urban life. We are not talking much any more about plucking brands from the burning. We are profoundly moved, however, with the idea of giving the non-Christian races our civilization, with its sanitation, education and industrial achievements. Above all are we interested in giving them our great Christian thought of a coming brotherhood of man which shall make it easy evermore to believe in God the Father.

Ashley J. Elliott

This prince among the Christian business men of our churches, died at his home in Peoria, Nov. 10. Though not well for several months, he had been confined to his room but a few days when the summons came.

He was in the prime of vigorous manhood, having been born Jan. 19, 1862. He spent his boyhood and youth in Indianapolis, where he was an active member of the Third Christian Church. He was the son of Mr. and Mrs. J. Perry Elliott, and the mother, a most estimable Christian woman, survives him. One brother, Walter, is a missionary in China, another Ernest, is assistant secretary of the National Brotherhood of the Christian Churches. Howard is a successful railroad man in California, and a sister Rose, has made an enviable record as a teacher in the Indianapolis schools. He was married Nov. 26, 1883, to Miss Alice Washburn, who, with the three children, Hiram, Chester and Dorothy, is left to carry a heavy load of sorrow. Both the sons are married and are successful business men.

He and I have been good friends since we were boys. I loved him like a brother. He was a brave, strong, good man. He took an active interest in Christian work. He was for many years a trustee of Eureka College, for two years the President of the Illinois State Y. M. C. A., and had served a long time as one of the State Executive officers. He was an enthusiastic Sunday-school worker. He attended nearly all of our Congresses, and National Missionary Conventions, and knew, and was loved by, a host of our people.

One of the last things he did was to superintend the building of a chapel in a day in Peoria.

The funeral services were held in the Central Church of Peoria, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 13, at two o'clock. They were conducted by Bro. W. F. Turner, his pastor, assisted by Bro. William Price, the minister of the Howett St., Christian Church, and the writer preached the sermon. A great concourse of railroad men, Y. M. C. A. workers, Sunday-school officials, and Brotherhood men, and sorrowing friends overfilled the big room.

We covered his casket and his grave with heaped blossoms, and we left his body on a hillside overlooking the Illinois river, and came away, a sense of irreparable loss tugging at our hearts.

Surely the world is poorer, since this friend of my youth went away.

Paris, Ky. CAREY E. MORGAN.

The Famous Rayo

Gives the Best Light at Any Price

When you pay more than the Rayo price for a lamp, you are paying for extra decorations that cannot add to the quality of the light. You can't pay for a better light, because there is none. An oil light has the least effect on the human eye, and the Rayo Lamp is the best oil lamp made, though low in price. You can pay $5, $10, or $20 for some other lamp, and although you get a more costly lamp, you can't get a better light than the white, mellow, diffused, unflickering light of the low-priced Rayo.

You will wish to remember the families of your congregation or the pupils of your school or class at Christmas time. There is no token so appropriate as a tasteful, simple card with a gracious Christmas greeting on it. We have prepared this for you. The sentiment is printed in Two Colors on a heavy paper folder enclosed in a white envelope of fine quality.

A CHRISTMAS GREETING

DEAR FRIENDS: Once more the whole round world gathers about the Manger-Cradle in Bethlehem. How wonderful that the Saviour of the world came as a Child into a human home. How full of wonder the words: "Unto us a Child is born!" Childhood is forever more significant, motherhood more sacred, the Home itself a brighter center of Life and Love.

On this good Christmas Day let us rededicate our homes to Him; let us resolve to lead the children in His Way; let us give the Bible its true place in the household; let us magnify love and friendship and service; let us cherish His Church and Kingdom; and let us bind all the influences of our lives about His feet

If this Greeting shall come to any who are sick, or burdened, or troubled, or absent from home, let it speak to every anxious heart of Christ's Peace

To one and all of you, and to all whom you hold dear, I send my heart's Greeting in His Name. May your portion of the Christmas Joy be truly plentiful—enough for you and for others beside

The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

These lessons afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday-schools of the Disciples to promote Christian union. Sixteen denominations have laid aside sectarianism to prepare the Bethany Graded Lessons for their schools.

The Graded Lessons may be begun at any time. January first is a most convenient time for the school to introduce them.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

Disciples and the Religious Press

UP TO THIS TIME, THE OPENING OF THE SECOND CENTURY OF THEIR HISTORY, THE DISAPPOINTING FACT MUST BE DELIBERATELY RECORDED THAT THE DISCIPLES' MESSAGE HAS NOT YET BEEN HEARD IN CHRISTENDOM.

As the forward movement among the Disciples for the further practice of Christian unity gets under way it finds its full significance discounted by the indifferent attitude of the religious press.

At the Topeka convention there was a strong sense of fatefulness and prophecy upon us. The organization of a Council on Christian Union to propagate the union sentiment, to establish an open forum magazine for the discussion of all aspects of the problem and to hold conferences in the great cities with leaders of all the churches participating, captivated the imagination of the convention.

Everybody felt that this action, following hard upon the earnest pleading of the convention's president that the Disciples change their attitude toward their Christian brethren, would waken a response in the Christian world as nothing else had ever done.

Our expectations were reassured that week when the daily press told us of the action taken by the Episcopalians at Cincinnati and that taken by the Congregationalists at Boston, looking toward the unity of Christ's people.

Thank God! our hearts said, unity is in the air. The report of the Topeka gathering will be news—good news, and every religious newspaper will tell what the Disciples have done in the same pages that tell what the Episcopalians and Congregationalists have done.

A month went by. Not a word appeared in the religious press outside the Disciple group of papers, save in one coarse-grained publication, which launched a hostile attack.

The great theme in these papers, meanwhile—aside from denominational matters—was Christian unity and recent steps taken toward it. That the notable action of the Disciples should have been totally disregarded led to the writing of the letter printed on page 7 of this issue.

Our readers will do well to read all the replies received. There is a courtesy and frankness in them that is grateful. But there is, even in those whose writers protest warmest sympathy with us, an implication that when it comes to the world movements of religion they do not reckon with the Disciples of Christ.

A similar attitude was revealed at the Edinburgh Conference, where with twenty-five delegates and more than fifty visitors from America, not one Disciple was called upon in the discussions. Dr. J. H. Garrison has already voiced the sense of injustice felt by Disciples in attendance there.

It is not the disregarding of the Topeka convention alone, which forms the basis of our present inquiry. It is, if one may put it so, the systematic unconsciousness of the leaders of American Christianity that such a body as the Disciples of Christ exists.

It is inconceivable, of course, that there is any animus in the oversight. The suggestion that religious leaders are in a cabal to repress the Disciples is too crude to be even mentioned. The declarations of friendliness by most of the editors are to be taken at their full face value.

These men simply are not aware of the Disciples, that is all.

It is humbling to us to write in this strain, to betray any consciousness of slight. But the profound passion of Disciple hearts to add their testimony in behalf of unity to the great words being spoken by others is alone our justification.

We wish to face the facts. We do not complain of others; we examine ourselves. However others may have been at fault through prejudice or ignorance, it is possible that part of the explanation lies with ourselves.

There is point in the observation made by Dr. Ward that the Disciples are not strong in the great cities, where the newspapers are published, nor in the east, where many of the great continental religious movements arise.

There is point, too, in the admission by some editors that the Disciples are not well understood. As a people, we seem to have had an extraordinary faculty for getting ourselves misunderstood.

Even while this sentence is being written, the postman brings a letter from a distinguished editor in the east, asking if the Disciples believe in baptismal regeneration! Mechanical notions of the Holy Spirit have been attributed to us. We have been classed with Unitarians. Until recently our true name was rarely applied to us without parenthetical explanation; and not two months since, a distinguished bishop referred to us as "Campbellites," in the formal sermon delivered before a convention which had just received a tender message of greeting and God-speed from our convention assembled at the same time.

Among other reasons might be named a certain clannish spirit which has kept the Disciples to themselves, an overwrought consciousness of difference between themselves and others, which has acted to inhibit their free fraternizing in Christian circles. This clannishness, it should be said, is fast being overcome.

Moreover, it will be admitted that the fact that Disciples have not produced a literature to mingle with the literature of the Christian world, and, in its silent way, acquaint the leaders of the Church with our ideals and spirit, is every way unfortunate.

But no doubt the most hindering fact in the way of a fair consideration by the Christian leaders of the achievements and ideals of the Disciples is the feeling that Disciples are making sectarian capital out of their Christian union talk. With more or less consciousness, intelligent churchmen resent this.

They hear us talk of union without a human creed, and see us setting up what happens to be our understanding of the Scripture in one or two points as the exclusive basis of union with them. In the presence of this inconsistency, so flagrant, so irreconcilable, to them, they are impatient, and refuse not only to go out of their way to learn more of our true spirit, but even to interest themselves in the facts that are all but thrust upon them.

The Christian Century wishes to say to the religious press whose editors' words are printed in our columns this week, that the Disciples are entering a new day. There is a strong forward movement now taking place within our borders. It is a movement in which "progressive" and "conservatives," are sharing, in which, indeed, these theological party lines are almost obliterated.

With greater urgency than ever, our testimony for unity is burning in our hearts. It is that we might bear this testimony that we came into being.

What holds the Disciples together is not a creed, or a ritual, or an ordinance, but a plea—an appeal to the Church of Christ to end its divisions and be one body. And with the success of their plea the bond of their distinctiveness will be broken and they will rejoice to be merged in the richer fellowship of the united church.

Plainly, the success of such an enterprise is not attained by building up a great denomination. The mere multiplication of churches with rapid increase of membership—gladdening as this is to our hearts as a token that we are bearing our part in the common Christian work of converting the world—does not satisfy the conscience of the Disciples.

Our deepest concern is to be interpreted by the moulders of Christian opinion to the church universal as a people who believe in the duty of Christian unity and already are striving to practice it.

With this ideal and purpose we believe our achievements and struggles have newspaper significance of the first order.

Social Survey

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

A Socialist Experiment Station

Milwaukee is to be our socialistic experiment station. If the good beginning being made by Mayor Seidel and his associates is kept up a new era in municipal government may be inaugurated. It may not be socialistic government, but it will be clean city administration and a rebuke to the old time political and gang domination of city affairs. Milwaukee elected a socialistic administration because it had been observing for some years that the socialistic element in both its city council and state legislature were always for those things that promised good for the public and against those that gave privileges to the corporations, the contractors and the gang. They have now won the county and a congressman on the strength of six months' trial that promises as much political honesty to the square inch as the Cream City had known of political crookedness from time immemorial. And yet it is not socialism as a theory that has made good thus far, but only a new party as a clarifier of conscience in regard to public duties. Tom Johnson and Mayor Gaynor did and are doing the same thing in so far as personal power could achieve, but the socialists of Milwaukee have the advantage in having made a clean sweep, and in all, so far, being of the same mind about what to do. To the dismay of the calamity howlers, they have not attempted any doctrinaire revolutions. They have just started in to "make good" by beginning at the beginning and dealing with each problem as it arises. They have changed less than one per cent of the city employees, thus rising above the iniquitous doctrine that to the "victor belongs the spoils." They have been concerned only to have the best man on the job regardless of his politics. Mayor Seidel says they will not allow the great corporations to monopolize the service of the experts—that the people need them much worse. Of course there are partizan socialists who do not like this, just as there are Prohibitionists who rejoice when the saloon wins over any other sort of a campaign than their own.

The Common Sense Method

Instead of the doctrinaire, the Milwaukee socialists have adopted the common sense method. The chief source of corruption in the big cities is the contract system and in the granting of franchises that carry monopolistic privileges. Before they came into office they had exposed a deal in the building of a viaduct that saved the municipality $160,000. Since coming, they have unearthed another paving deal that will save $25,000 this year alone. They are cleaning up the purchasing department and promise to effect there an ultimate saving of $100,000 per annum. They discharged all the political hangers-on and put the public servants to work, purged out a lot of petty grafting, found ways to utilize much of the waste that goes to the city dump, and are using the old creosoted paving blocks to restore asphalt on worn out streets and make new paving of it. They were left a deficit of $250,000 by the Democratic machine administration and will refuse to issue bonds longer to cover any deficits for current expenses. They expect to save enough out of current expenses instead to pay off the old regime's waste. They have sued the Street Railway Co. for $72,000 unpaid car licenses and will collect $5,000 annually from that source henceforth. They have won every suit of the kind so far and can hardly fail to win this one. They have plans under way by which they hope to save $500,000 annually by utilizing the city sewage after the Berlin method, and have already effected a saving of $75,000 by managing the people's business as they would their own. They have designed the best municipal prison in the world to replace the old work house—one of the worst in civilization. They have brought about the depression of many grade crossings by simply insisting that what ought to be done, be done. They have abolished liquor selling and other evils in the Red Light district and have refused some seventy-five saloons renewals of their licenses, serving notice on the business that it must clean up. But we repeat, this is not peculiar to socialism, it is peculiar to common honesty and public spirit only.

Will the Experiments Succeed?

So far, the test of socialism in Milwaukee has been that of public spirit and common honesty. In that preliminary test the party has made good. But that may be incidental to the fact that time has brought none of the human element of greed into their success. There is no doubt that their party greed is for the public good, but what will party success do for them? It remains to be seen whether they can keep partizanship and greed out of their success. But the real test of socialism comes, not in what they have done, but in what they propose to do. The socialization that is the end of socialistic contention is yet ahead. Their common sense method augurs well for a fair test of the experiment if only they are not handicapped by a denial of enabling acts. They will first establish municipal coal and wood yards, believing they have that legal right under the present charter. Then they hope to establish city ice plants and build comfort stations. They hope to meet the saloon evil by providing recreation and play centers and by providing plenty of clean, wholesome fruit at the cheapest possible prices. They have designed a series of radiating, parked avenues, that will reach from the heart of the city to the suburbs, and along which the people may live with an open green before them. They plan to put street cars on each of these avenues and give a three cent fare and at the same time inaugurate municipal ownership of street railways. In laying out these parked roadways they plan to buy all abutting land in the suburbs and by reselling the excess, realize enough from the increased price the improvements bring to pay the whole bill. They will open a municipal quarry in a rock-bed near the city that will supply crushed stone for streets at a fraction of the contracted cost, and hope to build a municipal printing plant that will not only enable them to save on printing bills, but to enlarge the publicity functions so that all the people may become interested in their city's affairs. Their street car system will include a series of local depots for the delivery and transfer of freight so as to keep the streets more clear of trucks and transfer wagons. They are already dividing the city into zones so as to keep factories and dwellings apart, and this is but one of the methods by which they propose to protect the workers and their children by protecting their home life. Perhaps the most appealing plan they propose is that of a suburb of workingmen's cottages. They will set apart a section for that purpose and Thomas Edison has offered them the use of his famous concrete model and molds free of all charges. He is intensely interested in the undertaking and will lend all the aid possible to it. He promises that they can build cozy and comfortable cottages for $1,800 and pay the bonds off in a few years with the income from rentals that are much reduced from the usual charges. The success of these plans will be a socialistic success.

A New Scourge

No sooner is one scourge banished than another appears. The mention of meningitis has been enough to make parents shudder. Now comes an equally terrorizing malady in infantile paralysis. It comes generally in heated seasons, July and August being the time of greatest danger, but is not specially a warm climate affliction at all. The greater number of cases have been observed in the neighborhood of congested foreign populations. It is notable that colored people have rarely been afflicted with it, but that may be incidental merely. It usually attacks children of from one to five years, though youth is by no means immune, and it has been known to take the lives of those in the sixties. It attacks the motor neurones—those ganglion cells of the spinal cord that control the development and movement of the muscles. As soon as the inflammation sets in the muscles begin to atrophy. The paralysis is most likely to be that of the legs first, but children soon become unable to hold up the head and digestive troubles follow. If the disease can be quickly arrested, normal or nearly normal functions may be resumed, or, in other words, there may be a nearly complete recovery. But three-fourths of those who do not die are never normal and must go through life crippled. The bones do not grow, the joints may be deformed, circulation will be poor, and digestion impaired. From one-third to one-half the cases result fatally even under best of care. The bacteria that causes this scourge has not been isolated. The most powerful microscopes cannot detect it. Like small-pox, it seems to be a virus infection. The Rockefeller Institute is devoting much attention to the study of it. It was reported, and noted in these columns, some time ago, that Dr. Flexner of that institution had discovered its vaccine, but this report was premature. It comes in epidemics, and while its genesis is as yet undiscovered, there are many signs that point to ultimate discovery. That insects may carry it and that it may be carried by those who do not themselves take it, is pretty clear. Complete isolation of children should follow any announcement of its presence.

Editorial Table Talk

The fifteenth annual report of the Board of Ministerial Relief has just been received. It contains the statement of services rendered through the year to superannuated ministers and their families, several extracts from letters of appreciation from such beneficiaries of the fund, the address of R. W. Abberley, delivered at the Topeka Convention, and the acknowledgment of receipts amounting to $16,372.

A significant illustration of the new forms of book-making with thin pages and flexible covers is found in the announcements made in reference to the new (11th) edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Twenty-nine slender volumes make a row about a yard in length, with a total weight of eighty pounds. The same amount of reading matter printed upon ordinary paper makes a row more than double the length, whose weight is two hundred and thirty pounds.

Rev. Charles Stelzle, the Secretary of the Church and Labor department of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, and also of the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches in America, has opened a "Labor Temple" in New York City at the corner of 14th Street and Second Avenue. The Temple is open constantly, and there are special programs of high class for the benefit of working people, every day in the week and at practically every hour on Sunday. Mr. Stelzle issues the "Labor Temple Bulletin," which gives full information regarding the week's work, and also a brief editorial of just the sort that working men would most appreciate.

During the Chapman-Alexander meetings in this city, thousands of New Testaments were distributed at the various churches, and large numbers of copies of the little pamphlet statement regarding "The Pocket Testament League Around the World," which is illustrated by many photographs of groups of New Testament students in various lands. The League was started by Miss Helen Cadbury, who later became Mrs. Charles M. Alexander. The copies of the New Testament distributed contain a membership pledge for signature, a statement of the purposes of the Pocket Testament League, and a schedule for a chapter a day through the year. This completes the New Testament once, and as far as the Book of Acts on a second course.

Mr. Guy W. Sarvis, of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, has recently spoken at the local conventions of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in Aurora and Freeport. He reports that the interest which reached a climax in the great Chicago convention last spring seems to be well sustained, and that there has been no serious reaction from the great enthusiasm of last year. Men who have never been interested in missions before have become profoundly interested in both missions and the church. The two things which these conventions are everywhere doing are to promote the habit of "getting together" among the churches of a community, and to make many business men take their religion seriously enough so that they are willing to make real financial investments in it.

In Utah the Democrats have declared for state-wide prohibition. In South Carolina the candidate of the prohibition element was defeated by the man who favors local option. In Tennessee, the nortorious Patterson, was compelled to withdraw from the race and Senator Bob Taylor, who as governor helped to give the state the law that sent the saloons from all but the large cities, is running in his stead, while the prohibition or Carmack Democrats are supporting the independent Republican candidate. Texas nominated a local option man but the state-wide prohibition people had unfortunately divided their vote between two men and so were defeated though casting a large majority of the total vote. The liquor dealers' organization acknowledge that a referendum on the question is inevitable.

Substantial and Effective Service

The Religious Education Association is performing its work in a quiet and effective manner throughout the country. Its headquarters in Chicago have recently been moved from 72 Madison street to the McCormick Building at the corner of Michigan avenue and Van Buren street. It is organized to render the service of a bureau of information regarding all lines of religious education. From January to October more than three thousand inquiries were received by mail regarding method, materials and literature. Thousands of circulars, booklets and other forms of printed information have been sent out. There is a large library and permanent exhibit of great value to visitors. People who are interested in any form of religious education could not do better than to spend an hour or two in the office of the Association examining the materials there exhibited. Conferences have been held by the General Secretary in twenty-five or more important cities and universities in all sections of the country. The Association has now a membership of 2,500 people, who are receiving the journal, "Religious Education," and are gaining the values of the work of one or more of the sixteen departments.

Non-partizan Felicitations

The election returns indicated one fact, pleasing to Disciples of whatever party. That fact was the almost certain election by the coming congress of Champ Clark as Speaker of the House of Representatives. In response to a note of congratulation, which bore the good wishes, not only of the Disciples of Chicago, but also the local chapters of the Delta Tau Delta fraternity, of which Mr. Clark is an honored member, the following letter has been received:

Dr. Herbert L. Willett,
University of Chicago,

My dear Friend and Brother: I was very glad indeed to receive your very kind letter of congratulation. Also extend my thanks to the Delta Tau Deltas. It is pleasant to be remembered by one's friends. It looks like I would be elected Speaker, although there is nothing certain in this life, except death and taxes. The opposition seems to be fading away rapidly. Truly your friend,

CHAMP CLARK.

Christianity and the New Era in China

Those who looked in upon the meetings of Chinese students held at Chicago and at Hartford last summer were struck by the fine-appearing young men who were the delegates. They were without queues, neatly dressed, genteel in deportment, ready of speech and wit, solemn in demeanor, and in fact gave the challenge in dignity and wisdom to any body of Anglo-Saxon men of like maturity. There are 500 of these young men in the United States, sent by the Chinese government. Though the Christian community in China numbers but a few thousands among the millions nearly one-third of these students are Christians. This is a parable of the part Chinese Christians will play in the remaking of China. These students are chosen by examination and on merit. The Christians excel as they ever do in mission lands and go to the forefront.

A splendid illustration of the practical manner in which the missionaries are helping to make the new China was illustrated in the coming of Halley's comet. From time immemorial the Chinaman has thought a comet a manifestation of the terrible dragon and was terror struck. This year the Christian Literature Society printed a poster telling when and how the comet would come and giving it a natural explanation. When it fulfilled their predictions and appeared on schedule time and answered descriptions the Chinese said that if they could tell when it was coming they must know all about it and there was no fear. The poster was distributed by the thousands and the newspapers published it in many places. Today the missioner does not denounce all things Chinese and go to save a few out of destruction. He goes to make all China better and to lend the greatest aid to the greatest number by leavening all the life of the people. His is a civilizing task, and to his gathering of the groups of Christians who become the leaven of the new social life of the people, he adds the leaven of his instruction in all that makes for destruction of the old superstition and the education of the nation in the arts of a higher life.

No better illustration of the exceptional way in which the Christians of the new era enter into the life of the times can be given than that afforded by "The Commercial Press" of Shanghai, as described by Dr. A. J. Brown. It was started twelve years ago by some young men who worked in a mission publishing house. Today it is capitalized at $1,000,000, employs 1,000 men, distributes one-fourth of the profits to the employes and sets aside another fourth for schools and insurance for them. An example for America as well as China.

A Chicago Ministerial Monday

If there are any ministers in Chicago who are acquainted with what is generally called "blue Monday," it must be those who have less work than the average member of our local ministerial associations.

Generally speaking, Monday is about the busiest day of the week for a Chicago minister. He may waken in the morning with a relieved sense of freedom which has not been his since the early part of the previous week. For, as the days went on, there came, of course, that increasing burden of the coming Sunday's ministries, in addition to all the stressful duties that each day presented.

But the momentary sense of leisure which a Monday morning brings is soon dissipated by the recollection of the ministerial engagements which his relation to denominational and interdenominational work compels.

A typical Monday in the calendar of the Chicago churches was that of last week, November 28. Nearly all of the Ministerial Associations hold their session at 10:30 a. m. But once or twice in the quarter these are adjourned to make way for the union meeting at Association Hall under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches.

Such was the program last week. The Chapman-Alexander evangelistic meetings had closed the night before. It was proper and indeed necessary to have the theme of the follow-up campaign presented. The meeting was devoted to that subject, and addresses were made by one of the evangelists in the large company of Chapman co-workers, and by one of the Chicago ministers who may be called, in a special sense, an evangelistic pastor.

Then Dr. Bacon, the new Secretary of the Federal Council for the central department, including nine states, with headquarters in Chicago, was introduced and made a brief statement regarding the plans of his office and the opportunity of securing the next quadrennial convention of the Federal Council for Chicago.

This suggestion was followed by a resolution inviting the officers of the Federal Council to select Chicago for the great gathering of 1912, to follow in due succession the preliminary convention held in New York five years ago, and the first convention held in Philadelphia last December. This resolution was carried enthusiastically.

The next engagement was a luncheon given by the Executive Council of the Religious Education Association to Bishop William Lawrence of Massachusetts, the successor of Phillips Brooks and the association. About fifty of the leading business and professional men of Chicago were present.

Bishop Lawrence made a clear and urgent statement regarding the ideals of religious education as they are conceived by the association, and spoke of the hopes entertained with regard to the next convention, which is to be held in Providence in February. He was followed by Mr. Henry F. Cope, the General Secretary of the Association, who in a brief and pointed address outlined the methods and activities of the Association, which has now become the recognized instrument for religious education of an interdenominational and scientific character.

Then came a meeting of the Executive Board of the Illinois Vigilance Association, which has accomplished such admirable results in the suppression of vile literature, the rescue of young women from lives of shame, and the protection of children from vicious influences.

The next item on the program was a hearing accorded to the representatives of both sides in the great garment workers' strike, which is now working such havoc among the laboring classes in Chicago. It was really an adjourned meeting of the united churches of Chicago under the auspices of the Federal Council, and in a way continued the morning session.

The Council had asked representatives of both employers and employes to be present. Hart, Schaffner and Marx, the leading manufacturers of clothing involved in the dispute, sent a letter stating that their side of the controversy had been fully published in the press of Chicago and they declined to make further representation.

The strikers were represented by Professor Coleman of Wellesley College and three of the operatives. Professor Coleman has been spending several months in Chicago studying the labor problem at first hand. She is an expert on the subject, and brings to her statement of the case a knowledge of the industrial situation both west and east, and a rare sympathy for the people who are fighting this great battle for better conditions.

She and the girls with her gave very effective accounts of the conditions under which the garment workers are compelled to labor. The sweating process, the "speeding up," the long periods of idleness between the rush seasons, and the low wages paid, were set forth in graphic and convincing fashion.

A resolution was passed empowering a committee representing the diferent ministerial associations to present to the manufacturers of garments the urgent request of the united ministerial bodies that they submit the matter to arbitration and consent to deal with a committee representing their striking employes.

Later in the day it was learned with satisfaction that the City Council of Chicago was taking almost precisely similar action.

By this time the dusk had settled down, and most of the ministers hurried away to their homes or to other engagements. But that will give some idea of the sort of program which the average minister in Chicago is likely to face on the Monday morning when he most feels that he would like to take a whole day for the odds and ends of his correspondence, reading, and the like.

Yet perhaps it is the very best way in which to get out from under the lingering spell of Sunday's work, both its inspiration and its depression, and to prepare himself for better work by contact with problems so much larger than his own parochial work, and so much harder to solve, that he goes back to his task with a sense of its definiteness, simplicity and attractiveness.

The Service Rendered by Ministers

Paul was the representative of the Christians to the Roman world. Attacks upon him were attacks upon Christianity. It might be supposed that all the Christians were ready to defend him, even at the risk of their lives. But there were some who did not have the courage to give open and unfailing support to the apostle or who did not have the intelligence to recognize what was involved in the attacks upon Paul. It is hard for the average man to see clearly the justice of a cause that does not promise immediate success, and success with him is determined by the vote of the majority. We ridicule the defeated candidate and we continue to regard him as a dangerous man long after we have adopted all the principles whose advocacy caused his defeat. The minister who has the insight to know the right and the courage to give it his undivided allegiance will often have no one to stand by him.

But Paul was not alone. "The Lord stood by me." Did some high official interpose in behalf of the apostle and secure his acquittal? Was Paul able to make a plea that moved the heart of Nero? No, apparently there is no reference to the outcome of the trial. The Lord strengthened him that the message might be proclaimed. His own faith did not fail. His was loyal to his Master. This was to him evidence that the Lord had stood by him. Whether he was to live or die was not for him to decide. He was willing to accept life or death. But it was his part to keep on good terms with himself. If he lived, it was his purpose to be worth something to his brethren. If he had to die, he was determined to make his death a testimony to the truth of Christ. No man has a right to live if he has to save his life by selling his soul. Not a few of the old ministers among us today have followed the example of Paul. They have thought of the message and not of their reputation or of the kind of success that wins the applause of the unthinking.

It is a great thing to feel that God has delivered us from past evils. It is a greater faith that says, "The Lord will deliver me." Paul was sure of himself and of God. He had been tried often enough to know something of what he could endure for the sake of his faith. He had experienced the help of God many times and therefore he knew God would never fail him. He looked forward without fear. There was no spirit of compromise in his life. Things that were indifferent he treated as indifferent. He was patient with the ignorant and slow. But he knew the goal that was before him and he did everything with a view to reaching the goal. He never chose a temporary advantage that was not a part of the eternal life of the gospel. The church has need of such faith today. There is danger that we shall emphasize numbers and dollars more than the faith that considers the future as well as the present. If we have at the present churches that may with truth be called Christian, it is because there were in the days of our fathers ministers who built for the future and who taught men to go forward to find God.

Midweek Service, Dec. 14. 2 Tim. 4:16-18.

Religion in its true sense is the most joyous thing the human soul can know; and when real religion is realized, we will find that it will be an agent of peace, of joy, and of happiness, and never an agent of gloomy, long-faced sadness. It will then be attractive to all and repulsive to none.—Ralph Waldo Trine.

Why Does the Press Disregard the Disciples?

Opinions of Fourteen Leading Religious Editors

[The following letter was recently addressed to sixteen leading religious editors of the United States. Fifteen replies were received; fourteen of them are given below, one asking further time to prepare his statement for the public.—EDITORS THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.]

My dear Sir: A curious inquiry has arisen in my mind. I have been scanning the religious and religio-secular papers for several weeks to find some mention of the Disciples' Convention held the fore part of October in Topeka, Kans. I find much comment and repeated attention given to the Episcopal Convention at Cincinnati, the Congregational Council in Boston, the Y. M. C. A. Convention in Toronto, and several references to a Free Methodist Convention, but as yet I have found absolutely nothing concerning the Disciples' gathering. I am writing you and about a dozen other leading editors to see if I cannot discover why the great Disciple gatherings and achievements are so systematically overlooked in our religious press. My inquiry is not the result of pique or petulance in any sense. It is a newspaper man's motive that prompts it. I think that its answer may be instructive to the Disciple constituency which The Christian Century serves.

I wish to ask you personally why your paper made no mention of the Topeka meeting.

Is it because the officers of the convention did not touch the proper publicity button?

Is it because the Disciple movement does not seem to possess significance in the religious world beyond its own borders?

Is it because the Disciple conventions are not legislative bodies? Of course, in this latter event, the Topeka meeting might still have equal significance with the Boston Council.

It surely is not because the convention was small numerically, for there were seven or eight thousand people in attendance. This, of course, is larger than either the Boston or Cincinnati meeting.

It surely is not because the Disciples are so far behind others in missionary achievements, for this year close to $2,000,000 was given by their body for unselfish work beyond their local congregations.

Nor can the reason be that the Disciples lack vitality and evangelistic power, for with all their evangelistic faults, I suppose that they are more vigorous in their propagating efforts than any other American religious body.

Nor yet, finally, can the reason be that nothing significant was projected at Topeka, for while the papers have made much of the Episcopal call for a conference on Christian Unity and the resolution of the Congregational Council on the same subject, the Disciples took action on the establishment of a Council on Christian Union, whose aims and methods, it seems to me, are quite as significant as concerns the changed attitude on the part of the Disciples themselves, and potentially as far-reaching in their practical effects upon Christendom, as anything that was done at Boston or Cincinnati.

I do not mean to be arguing a case with you in writing this. The only reason I have for setting down such facts as I have indicated above, is that you may have at hand the data which constitute the basis of my inquiry and seem to me to justify it. I am trying to find out why a people as large as the Presbyterians, and nearly twice as large as the Episcopalians or Congregationalists, do not seem to the moulders of public opinion, such as you and other editors are, to have more significance. My question is, I may say again, not personal, but editorial in its motive. I should feel like asking it if I were not even a member of the Disciples' church. I shall regard the answer which you may be so good as to give as confidential, if you prefer it; or I may wish, if you will allow it, to use your reply with or without your name, as you may indicate. May I assure you of my highest personal regard for you and your work and the utmost sincerity in asking my questions. Very gratefully yours, CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

THE CHURCHMAN (EPISCOPALIAN).

My dear Mr. Morrison:—I owe you an apology for this delay in answering your letter of November 10, an apology which I hereby make to you as I have had to make to many of my own people, because of the overpressure of work and my inability to keep up with my correspondence. For the past week I have had only one night at home.

I am deeply interested in the point that you make against The Churchman with regard to the Topeka Convention, and can only say that our failure to report would seem to have been wholly due to having no account of the meeting and to the fact that the newspaper reports escaped our notice. My associate who handles matters of that kind was reporting our General Convention, and I had to be there part of the time. Dr. Ward sent me a report of the Congregational Council, and I trust in future that you will be good enough to give me any information that you feel would be helpful to the great cause and that it would be practicable for us to use. Our desire is to colaborate and to co-operate in any way that makes for better understanding and closer fellowship between all Christians. Perhaps even now you would inform me of the specific action taken at Topeka on the subject of co-operation and unity.

I find that you are correct with regard to our failure to report the Topeka Convention but not quite correct in saying that we made no mention of it. Dr. Wells in his report of the General Convention recorded the exchange of messages between Topeka and Cincinnati. This fraternal greeting having been recorded might have suggested to us, if we had been under less pressure, an inquiry as to the action of your convention.

Your letter is thoroughly appreciated and I beg again to thank you for it. Very truly yours, SILAS MCBEE, Editor.

THE INDEPENDENT.

My Dear Sir:—It may be difficult to tell why the great meeting of the Disciples Convention in Topeka was not more generally noticed in the religious journals. I am not aware but that it was fairly noticed in the western journals. I am perfectly well aware of the greatness of the body, one of the greatest in the country and one that has grown very rapidly, but it has not had the notice which its magnitude deserves. Perhaps one reason and an important one, is that it has been largely a country church. It has not been particularly a city church, like the Episcopalian and the Presbyterian. For that reason it has escaped observation in the centers where newspapers are printed. Further than that it is a western body and very little known in the east, and it is not strange that eastern journals have given little notice of it. You refer to the fact that its polity is congregational, and yet you say that the Congregationalist National Council was well noticed in the papers. I might say, however, that the Baptist meetings are not much noticed in the papers and that the Congregational National Council probably would not have been but for the fact that the American Board held at the same time its centennial; and I may add that pretty serious questions of church management had been before the denomination for three years and had attracted some attention. Very likely also the Church of the Disciples has not particularly made itself known. It has been too busy making converts to do much advertising.

And this reminds me that I wish you can send me the action taken at Topeka for the establishment of a Council on Christian Union.

I may not have correctly given or fairly judged the reasons for the public oversight of the Church of the Disciples, but these are the points that occur to me. Very truly yours, WILLIAM HAYES WARD.

New York City.

THE STANDARD (BAPTIST).

Dear Mr. Morrison:—I have your favor of Nov. 14. There is no particular reason why The Standard made no mention of the meeting of the Disciples at Topeka. The matter did not come before my attention in any way that was striking, and therefore it was overlooked, especially as the meetings occurred at a time of the year when all the editors of The Standard are apt to be out of the city in attendance upon state convention meetings, and when matters of this sort are not so carefully studied as would be the case at other times of the year.

I am sure that anything that was of religious interest in the annual convention of the Disciples would be regarded as fit material for publication in The Standard. It must be, therefore, that somehow or other, the daily papers did not make any particular notice of the meetings, and therefore the matter was not called to our attention by publication of this sort. But that is the way of the daily papers in treating important religious gatherings. A football game, with twenty-two players is, according to daily newspaper standards, very much more important than a religious convocation with 3,000 or 30,000 participants.

It might be well for the Disciples to follow the notable examples of some other denominations, and appoint special committees on publicity of the proceedings of their conventions. Material is thereby provided in a way which tends to accuracy as well as to publicity. The average reporter for the daily papers is woefully ignorant of what is going on in a great convention and of its significance. Very truly yours,

J. S. DICKERSON,
Chicago. Managing Editor.

THE LITERARY DIGEST.

Dear Sir:—In reply to your favor of the 16th asking why we overlooked the convention of your church in Topeka, I would say that we do not aim to report the conventions of the various religious bodies, unless they contain some special features of interest to all our readers, including all religious bodies. Our religious department thus presents quite a hard problem, and many readers cannot understand why we omit reference to some meeting or speech that is of intense interest to their special church, but of little or no interest to anybody else. We leave these matters of interest within each church to the denominational papers, and treat only the topics that will interest everybody. We are constantly on the watch for topics of interest in such gatherings as yours, as you can readily see that it would be fatal to us to adopt an attitude of coldness or indifference toward any religious body. Very truly,

New York. WM. S. WOODS, Editor.

THE LIVING CHURCH (EPISCOPALIAN).

Dear Sir:—Replying to your favor of 18th inst., we would say that The Living Church is a periodical of the Episcopal Church and does not purport to report the news of other Christian bodies. Incidentally, of course, matters of news pertaining to others is referred to when there seems particular occasion, but not in any sense as a matter of implying that the news of the whole Christian world is reported therein. Very truly yours, FREDERIC C. MOOREHOUSE, Milwaukee, Wis. Editor.

THE OUTLOOK.

Dear Sir: In reply to your letter to Dr. Abbott, who is not here at present, we will say that The Outlook does not now undertake to give reports of all church conventions; and, if you were to scan our columns, you would probably find that other important denominational meetings besides that to which you refer have not been mentioned. We have in times past, very frequently, had paragraphs about the Disciples' Convention, and the only reason we did not have one this year was that no member of our staff was present and no one connected with the Disciples' Church either sent us special information or offered to send us a special report. This would be no adequate explanation if we were undertaking to report all conventions, but, as we have said, we do not so undertake.

Our plan is, as regards not only religious conventions but other important meetings of all kinds, to talk about them or some of them only when we have something special to say. We do not intend to give formal reports of anything, but to select from the vast mass of news that which is of really national importance and about which we have something to say which, we suppose, will interest people of all denominations and in all parts of the country. It is quite likely that the Disciples' Convention did have such important aspects but, as we have said, in some way this year those aspects were not brought to our attention.

A letter from another correspondent who wrote in the same vein as that in which you write led us to say to him that, if he would send us something about the Disciples' Convention which would meet the requirements we have outlined above, we should very probably be able to use it without reference to the question of immediate timeliness. Moreover, you may be perfectly certain that we have not, as you seem to imagine, deliberately marked off the Disciples from other denominations in this question of treatment. We know that church is not only large but influential and abounding in zeal. The Outlook, however, is not essentially a church paper and we treat church matters just as we do political, economic and social matters —that is, on the selective rather than the all-inclusive principle. Yours very truly,

THE EDITORS OF THE OUTLOOK.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST.

My dear Mr. Morrison:—I have received several letters from members of the Disciples Church asking the same question that you ask in your letter of Nov. 12. The only reason why we did not discuss in The Congregationalist the meeting of the Disciples was that such news as we received of it did not seem to me of special interest to Congregationalists. We rely usually on our Chicago correspondent for reports of general meetings of other denominations. Glancing over the columns of our religious exchanges not of your body I don't find much mention of the convention. Quite likely you are right in feeling that it deserved more attention. I am glad to have these letters inviting me to consider what the Disciples are doing. I had not supposed that the movement in your body toward Christian union really signifies what it seems to signify among Episcopalians at this time. I had supposed that it really meant a union in which immersion would be a prerequisite.

I do not think it was because of any prejudice against the Disciples or any desire to belittle their work that caused us to pass them by.

Did you notice whether the Christian Standard, the Christian Evangelist and other papers paid much attention to the meeting of the Congregational National Council? Yours very truly, A. E. DUNNING, Editor.

Boston.

THE CONTINENT (PRESBYTERIAN).
Formerly The Interior.

My dear Mr. Morrison: I am very much interested in your frank letter of the 7th inst. But your premises are not quite as well founded as they seemed to you when you wrote. You have by this time seen our issue of November 10, I take it, and you will discover that on three different pages in the Religious World and Editorial there is a good deal about the Disciples. This will prove to you that I have by no means been indifferent to the convention at Topeka. Of course, the delay of almost a month is obvious, and I am sorry for that. This was partially due to the fact that I had to wait for the issues of The Christian Century to get information that I felt I could rely on, and your full report number did not appear, as I remember, until the last week of October.

I don't know whether I can go on to answer your question further without the risk of appearing unkind. But I trust you'll not take it so, when I say that I think the plain reason why the Disciple fellowship doesn't exercise in the country an influence commensurate with its numbers, is due to the sectarian spirit of a very great portion of your people in the South, where as I suppose two-thirds of your numerical strength must lie. Even in Ohio, I could not have as high an esteem for the Disciple Church as I have learned to have in Chicago. It is not necessary to point out to you the reasons for that. They are comprehended in your own description of the faults of the church which I have quoted in The Continent, and which you are so bravely and forcefully fighting right straight along. To present, as so many of your preachers do, a plea for church union based on a simple acceptance of the Bible without any creed, and then to insist on imposing their own interpretation of the Bible on everyone else, is a paradox which is of course perfectly obvious to intelligent people, but which seems not yet to have occurred to a very great many Disciple ministers. As long as this is the type of preaching by which your people are known, they may accumulate numbers among the thoughtless and bigoted, but they cannot of course exercise any real influence in the world of religion as a whole.

Just in proportion as what you and Dr. Willett are doing comes to success, just in that proportion will your people count in the councils of Christendom. I rejoice to think that the Disciple fellowship is counting more and more just because the body as a whole is turning more and more to your ideals. I am glad to have the opportunity of telling you that I admire The Christian Century in its uphill fight and that I trust you'll have grace and other resources sufficient to keep you going on through to the end of a fine success. Heartily yours, NOLAN R. BEST.

NORTHWESTERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE (METHODIST).

Dear Mr. Morrison: I write in great humiliation of spirit, for the Disciples' Convention in Topeka, Kans., appealed to me only as a local and not a national affair. Moreover, I am not quite sure that I have been liberated from the bondage of regarding the denomination as among the so-called minor bodies in which popular interest is but slight outside of the denomination. This, of course, is an outrage and ought not so to be, and personally, I am heartily ashamed of my feeling about it. I wonder sometimes if the prejudice does not arise from the fact of your name, which of itself denotes pietism and a mild fanaticism. You see with what frankness and prejudice, and even ignorance, I write. Will you help me to a better state of knowledge and send me an article of twelve hundred words on the present status and outlook of the body you represent?

For your frank and searching letter and for its helpful rebuke, I remain, Very gratefully yours, CHARLES M. STUART, Chicago. Editor.

THE WATCHMAN (BAPTIST).

My Dear Dr. Morrison:—In reply to your esteemed favor of the 14th, I would say that I should have been pleased to notice the Disciples Convention at Topeka, but the daily papers gave me absolutely no information regarding it. I did not know that any action regarding Christian union was taken until Mr. Ainslie, of Baltimore, mentioned it in a letter. You know I am very much interested in Christian unity, and especially in the union of the Baptists and Disciples, and I would gladly have given an account of the Convention at Topeka if I had been supplied with information.

We have the same trouble as you. Our Baptist meetings are seldom even referred to in the daily papers. Probably one reason is that they are not legislative bodies, but the special reason is that we make no effort to have them reported. The Congregationalists pay a man to give the Associated Press full reports of their meetings. He has duplicate copies of all important reports and addresses made, and hands them to the reporters of the different papers, and he is in touch with the manager of the Associated Press, and is his representative at the meetings. He is always a man familiar with journalism, and knows how to put things in shape so that editors will use at least some portion of what he sends.

Of course the Presbyterian Assembly and the Methodist Conference, and the Episcopal Convention, being legislative bodies, with authority, are carefully watched and reported. Congregational, Disciple and Baptist bodies being only voluntary and advisory, do not offer that concentrated interest which catches the secular press. But they will print good accounts if we supply them in suitable shape without cost.

The reports in denominational weekly papers are too late to be fresh and interesting.

With best wishes that Disciples and Baptists may soon be one in work as well as one in Christ. Yours cordially, Boston. E. F. MERRIAM, Editor.

NAME WITHHELD FROM PUBLIC.

Dear Brother:—I do not care to give my explanation of the general failure of the religious press to give more attention to the proceedings of the Disciple Convention. I may say to you personally that I am not looking for a dispute, and that such explanation could only end in dispute.

I note what you say as to the changed temper on the part of the Disciples as to Christian Union, but see no evidence of great change, though the Progressive or reasonable wing of the church is growing stronger. Its latest proposals of union are as impossible as those of the Roman or Episcopal church There can be no Christian union on the basis of papal supremacy, apostolic succession or a mode of baptism.

Furthermore.—I do not believe that a plan of union originated by a church which is divided as your church is and whose leading men and papers are as intolerant one of another as your papers from the Standard to the Octographic show you to be, is entitled to very serious consideration.

I can rejoice in your success when it is purely evangelistic or missionary, but I have learned from long experience and close association with your leading men, that it is next to impossible to have any intercourse without continually meeting the proposition that your brotherhood is "it" and all of it, and that we unimmersed people are out of the fold, and that denominations are sinful.

If your churches and papers will devote their energies to evangelizing men and baptizing them according to your convictions, and will allow others to do the same, according to their convictions, and will push your own denominational work allowing other denominations to do the same, Christian unity will be promoted.

You have written frankly, and I reply in the same spirit.

THE PITTSBURGH CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE (METHODIST).

My dear Brother.—In reply to your courteous letter of inquiry let me say that I appreciate the spirit of it, accept the involved though disclaimed rebuke and proceed to explain that your convention was held so far west that it received scant notice from the secular papers which we read here and fell at a time when I was particularly busy and did not find time to read our exchanges including your excellent paper and the Standard of Cincinnati. I have seen some references to the action of the convention on the subject of Christian Union and the new attitude taken and desire to know more fully and accurately just what was done and proposed. Suppose I postpone further answer to your inquiries and that you send me an account of what was done and the proposed basis of union. Sincerely yours,

Pittsburg, Pa. J. J. WALLACE, Editor.

THE RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE (UNITED BRETHREN).

My dear Doctor Morrison:—Yours of November 15 awaited my return from a trip to Illinois. In the autumn months we find it impossible to keep in touch with all religious movements, as our own conferences are on and the editors are giving all the help in the field that they can. The Religious Telescope made mention of the general meetings of the Southern Methodist, the Congregationalist, the Episcopalians, and the United Evangelicals. The last named was considered because it has a special fellowship with the United Brethren Church; the Congregationalist because of an acquaintance and the spiritual development several years ago looking toward organic union; the Southern Methodist because of some legislation that they tried to work through which already had been effected in our own denomination; the Episcopalian partly because of the nearness of the convention to our own city and partly because of the discussion on union which seems to mean nothing more than an enlarged Episcopalian Church.

Nothing in the daily papers which came to our office brought the work of your convention prominently before us, and at that time most of our exchanges did not have their customary attention. I have been acquainted with the Disciples Church from boyhood and admire its businesslike administration of affairs. I never did admire the pretension of its members to being the only real church, but I am glad to see a growing spirit of fraternalism and liberality toward other denominations. I am not acquainted with the Topeka plan for union. There was no denominational slight intended by omitting mention of your convention; rather did such go by default on account of stress in the office at the time. Yours sincerely,

Dayton, Ohio. J. M. PHILLIPPI, Editor.

NAME WITHHELD FROM PUBLIC.

My dear Dr. Morrison:—I have your letter of November 16th and have read it with interest. The absence of any notice of your Topeka meeting was not due to any prejudice against your people or lack of interest in your work and welfare. Nothing came to us from the meeting and our paper is always crowded and so it happened that nothing appeared in our columns about it. When your convention was held in ———— I attended one session of it and paid considerable attention to it in articles and editorial notices. Your church is doing a great work and has made splendid progress in recent years. If I were to speak frankly I would, however, mention the fact that ministers of other denominations sometimes feel that you do not treat us altogther fairly. You talk much of church unity and yet you scarcely recognize us as churches. Many of your churches refuse to give letters to our churches. I have had this occur in my own experience as a pastor. We do not complain that you will not receive our letters for we understand you do not rcognize our baptism. When you decline to give letters to your people to come to our churches we wonder what kind of church unity you are after. Another point I might mention is that it seems to me that many of your ministers are riding a denominational hobby. You profess not to be a denomination and yet it seems to me you are one of the most intensely denominational denominations in the country. Your ministers, as I know them, are constantly preaching on primitive Christianity and indoctrinating your people with the idea that your type of Christianity is more Christian than ours. I can tell from the topics anounced in the newspapers that whatever the subjects of the sermon the real sermon is on this distinctive denominational idea. Now we Presbyterians and Methodists rarely preach distinctively on Presbyterian or Methodist points. We simply preach the universal gospel and never make criticisms of and flings at other denominations. As I am growing bold, I will further say that I have found your people much given to proselytizing and they bear this reputation very generally throughout our part of the country. I am pastor of a church myself and members and ministers of your denomination have come right into the homes of my people and tried to persuade the children to go to their Sunday-school. We do not do this kind of thing ourselves and, naturally, we do not like it in others.

Now my dear doctor, I have written this freely and confidentially to you. I have great respect for your church and rejoice in its prosperity and progress. I always speak well of it in the —— when I speak of it at all and I trust you will not be offended at the frank expression of some private views.

Baptist or Methodist

The large company, gathered from far and near, sat or leaned on rock or root in this wide edifice fashioned by natural forces. The preacher poured out his heart, drawing near "through Nature to Nature's God" in the hush and shadow of the hour. After the breaking, i. e., closing, a group of men were earnestly discussing the question of the denomination to which the preacher belonged. The disputants were of different sects, and each seemed to desire to claim the preacher. One said, "I low he's er Babtist. He hed them ther logs er rollin' in the water lak he war a Babtist." A Methodist brother disagreed with this, and said, "I kin tell er Methodist as fur as I kin see, let lone hearin' him talk. He's er Methodist shore." "Hol' on now," said another Baptist; "He's shore er Hardsheller, he worked fore-knowledge right through thet thar talk—hit stuck out et ther beginnin' and hit stuck out et ther end." The arguments were waxing warm when some one suggested that an appeal be made to the preacher's guide to settle the question. The guide knew the preacher's power would be increased as long as no one sect could claim him, so he said to the inquirer, "Each one of yer pretends to know more about God then eeny one, an' ye all reads yer Bible, now if yer caynt pick out yer man when yer see and hear him, I ain't goin' ter tell yer." And with this shot he walked away.—Berea Quarterly.

Marconigram—Prayer

WRITTEN AT SEA BY REV. W. L. SWEET.

A meaningless instrument yonder,
Making an unintelligible noise,
Is flashing out into the distance
Messages of sorrows and joys.
From ship to ship man is speaking,
From shore to shore he is heard,
As he tells how his vessel is leaking,
Or how it flies on like a bird.
And back comes a promise of meeting—
A "keep heart, we fly to thine aid."—
Or an answer of joyous greeting,
"Sing on like a bird—be not afraid."
Out in the midst of life's ocean,
My bark is tossed on the deep;
But my spirit is free from commotion
Because with my Master I speak.
I tell him my joy and my sorrow,
There is nothing but I speak in his ear;
And I know that today, or tomorrow,
His answer I surely shall hear.

Where Disciples Flourish

Bird's Eye View of Accomplishments in Illinois City

BY H. D. WILLIAMS.

Bloomington, Ill. is a great city for Disciples. They flourish here. They have three fine congregations with a combined membership of about 2400 in a city of 33,000. The writer is not acquainted with any other city where the Disciple churches enroll so large a proportion of the population, are so free from cliques, have less of the class spirit and possess more of the spirit of real service for the kingdom of God.

The Statesman and General.

Every well-informed Disciple knows that J. H. Gilliland came to this city over twenty years ago and generaled the cause until a few months ago. Under his masterful leadership the three splendid edifices were erected and he was successively pastor of the three congregations, taking the lead in the organization of the two younger. No one can think of the achievements here without credit to J. H. Gilliland. The churches gratefully recognize him as their benefactor and hold him in highest esteem.

In 1906 when Mr. Gilliland left the First Church to lead the new Second Church the mother church called its present pastor, Edgar DeWitt Jones, then with the Franklin Circle Church in Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Jones is still a young man, being only thirty-three, but he has made himself worthy of a careful study by other ministers. His leadership is unique. It may be termed the leadership of magnanimity. His self-abnegation, his charming personality and his genuineness are so very evident that all things count it a joy to give him right of way. Thus he leads without effort and without friction.

Sermons Carefully Prepared.

As a preacher, Mr. Jones is simple, direct and practical. His sermons are evidently prepared with great care; but they are delivered with an ease and freedom that have no suggestion of the study. He makes no attempt to be erudite or profound, but strikes at once at the heart of his subject around which he builds a practical and helpful discourse. He never rants or storms.

He calmly talks right on, drawing on Scripture, literature, history and experience in the manner of a conversation in his study.

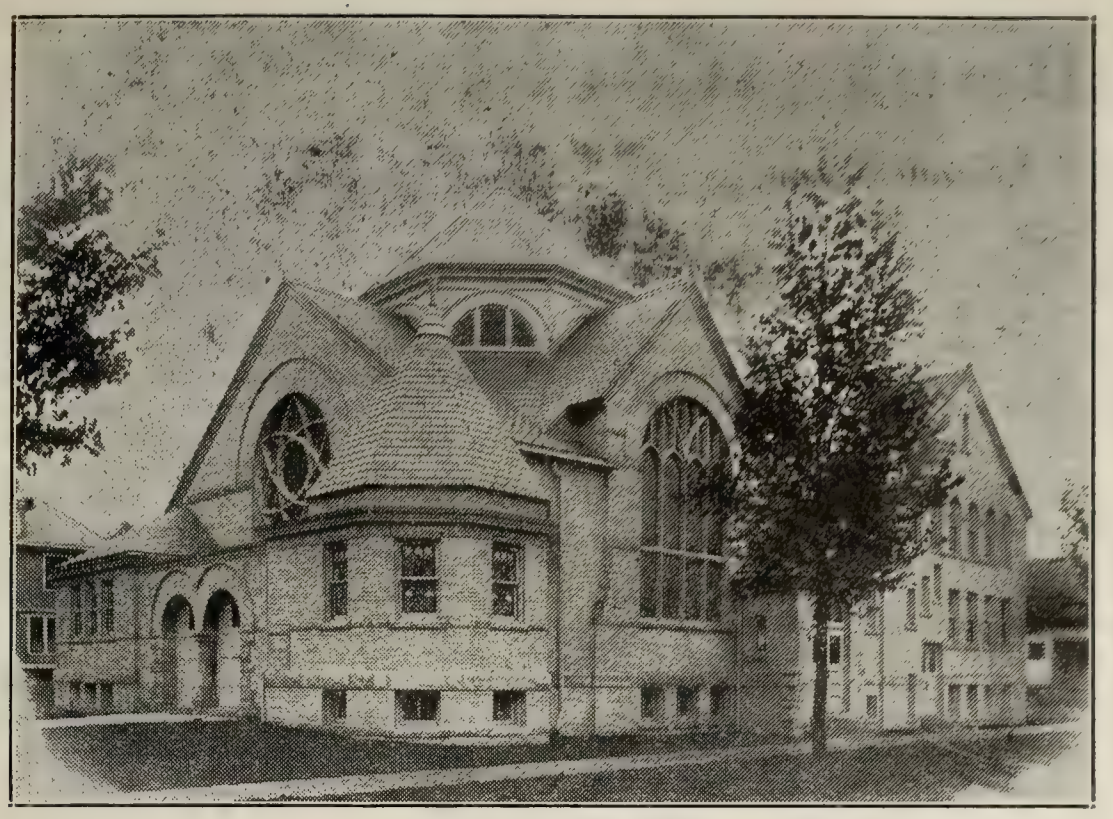
The teaching faculty of Mr. Jones is superb. He presides with masterful skill over a Monday night Bible Study Class. It includes the Sunday-school teachers, but has an attendance of from 50 to 75 and is growing into one of the finest opportunities on the minister's program. Mr. Jones makes the hour an inspiration to any one, especially to the teachers.

Tribute of Outsiders.

One of Bloomington's prominent citizens, a member of another church, said to the writer: "Mr. Jones has the greatest church in Bloomington, and his church has the greatest minister in the city. This is said without any disparagement of the other churches and ministers: it is a fact universally recognized here."

Rev. Milo Atkinson.

A year ago when Mr. Gilliland left the Second Church to lead the new Centennial Church, he was succeeded by Stephen H. Zendt, who came from Oskaloosa, Iowa. Mr. Zendt is a radically different type of man from Mr. Jones, but he gets at his task quite as efficiently. He is one of those jovial fellows who tell good stories and laugh heartily. He is a fine mixer and makes friends with all classes. He is a man's man and at the same time one of the big hearted men whom children love and sinners trust.



From Mechanic to Preacher.

Mr. Zendt was formerly a mechanic. Like some other very forceful preachers, he found himself in the pulpit in spite of shop and forge and other hindrances. The manner of his former life gives him some valuable advantages as a minister. He knows working men and their problems as do but few ministers. Bloomington is coming to know this, for he has been chosen by the ministers to represent the churches in the Trades and Labor Council, a service for which he is eminently fitted.

As a preacher Mr. Zendt is logical, practical and forceful. He eschews speculations and deals with the great practical problems. He never descends to trivialities and pulpit shows; his sermons deal with the forces of spiritual life. He preaches at the people and hits them, but does it with a grace that wounds to save.

The Centennial Church.

Meeting Difficult Situations Efficiently.

Mr. Zendt's is the most difficult parish of the three, but he is meeting the situation heroically and successfully. An intelligent gentleman living near the church, but not a member, referred to Mr. Zendt as follows: "He is just the man needed by this church. He is the pride of this part of our city. Everybody likes him and he is drawing good crowds."

Milo Atkinson of the new Centennial Church is a young man of fine spirit. I have not had the opportunity to learn so much about him, but the things learned are most complimentary. He came from Covington, Ky., where he did an excellent work. There are many reasons to believe he is the right man for this important field. He is posted on the problems of the day and is a student of more than ordinary compass and insight. He has the spirit of a true shepherd to his flock. He is a good speaker with a powerful but well modulated voice. His manner is conversational, though at times he becomes dramatic in the expression of strong feeling.

Sermons Short and Fat.

A man who hears him frequently complimented him nicely the other day. But to understand the compliment one must first know that Atkinson is six feet and four inches high and as lean as a rail. The man said with a sort of laugh; "Well, Atkinson is long and lean but his sermons are short and fat. That's why we like him so well out here."

Brethren Dwell in Sweet Unity.

The unity and good fellowship existing among these churches and ministers is beautiful to behold. May it ever abide!

Rev. S. H. Zendt.

The treatment accorded those who sojourn among them is ideal. Any Disciple should love to live in Bloomington and be a worker in any of the three churches here represented.

Another delight in Bloomington is the office of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, presided over by J. Fred Jones and W. D. Deweese. It is a joy to saunter into that place when one is tired and talk awhile with such genial and genuine souls as Deweese and Jones.

New Dormitory at Bethany

On Thursday, November 18, the faculty and students of Bethany College assembled on the campus to witness the laying of the cornerstone of the large new dormitory. The laying of this corner stone marks the beginning of a new era for Bethany College. The future is bright with promise. Nearly every week that passes now brings to our ears some new gift, or some new plans among the friends for the near future.

This handsome building, the scene of today's ceremony, is being erected by Judge Cochran of Uniontown, Pa., at a cost of thirty thousand dollars. When finished it will be one of the most thoroughly equipped buildings of its kind in this country. It stands on a large tract of ground, formerly known to college students as the "Ranch," which was purchased by Judge Cochran two years ago. By this purchase the college grounds were extended to the main street of the village, along which the new trolley takes its course. It is a handsome four-story structure, built of white Kittanning brick and roofed with green tile made in Chicago. On one side it fronts the college, on the opposite it fronts the main street and trolley line, while on a third side it fronts the broad College avenue, leading to the handsome new gateway, the gift of Mr. Oglebay of Wheeling. The building contains eighty-five rooms, is fireproof throughout, and is equipped with the most perfect plumbing system of modern times. It is arranged in three distinct apartments, separated each from the other by dead walls. A separate entrance leads to each apartment, each of the three fronts of the building having, by this arrangement, a doorway, halls and stairways. The first floor contains the dining room and kitchen, a commodious laundry, a cooling room, and a suite of rooms for the care-taker of the building. On the second and third floors the rooms are arranged in suites of three, a sitting room and two bedrooms, with a bath and lavatory for each two suites. The fourth story rooms are arranged in pairs,—that is, two rooms with a doorway between, but each room may be made private if desired, by closing the doorway. The hall is erected to the memory of Judge Cochran's only son, a graduate of Bethany, who died two years ago.

Eureka College to Receive $40,000

Word is received that the suit brought by the heirs of Mrs. Henrietta C. Pheasant, late of Mechanicsburg, Ill., to break her will, leaving most of her property to Eureka College, has been settled by compromise. The college will receive about $40,000 as its share. In connection with Mr. Peters' glowing letter published last week, this bequest puts Eureka's financial affairs into larger and more creditable figures. All Discipledom in Illinois should now have a part in putting this college on a sound basis. This $40,000 does not count on the $125,000 campaign. Mr. Peters has already reported pledges for $75,000.

The Book World

THE MEANING OF SOCIAL SCIENCE. Professor Albion W. Small, Head of the Department of Sociology at the University of Chicago, has published a number of volumes upon this subject, which is engaging more attention than any other single science at the present time. Yet perhaps no science is more likely to be misinterpreted because it covers so wide a field of human interest and finds so many divergent forms of expression. A recent volume by Professor Small attempts to interpret this very variety of interest in terms of a larger unity. With a clearness of thought and a charm of manner that will be appreciated by all readers of the book, he has outlined the four phases of social science, the descriptive, analytical, evaluating and constructive. He regards this theme as, if not the most sacred, at least next to religion in worth. He says, "In all seriousness, then, and with careful weighing of my words, I register my belief that social science is the holiest sacrament open to men. It is the holiest because it is the wholest career within the terms of human life. Restraining myself from prediction, and holding strictly to confession, I am able to foresee no other development for religion than the progressive sloughing off of its ritualistic attachments and corresponding enrichment of its realistic content." The whole circumference of social science is the indicated field for those "works" without which the apostle of "salvation by faith" declared that faith is dead. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1910, pp. 299. $1.50 net.)

STORY TELLING. Every parent and teacher knows how potent is the story for entertainment and instruction in the life of children. How is the taste for the right kind of stories to be developed? In this new world just when story telling was in danger of becoming a lost art, it has suddenly been revived with fresh enthusiasm. Miss Edna Lyman has rendered a distinct service to all those who are charged with the safeguarding of child lives, by the preparation of this little volume whose purpose it is to give information regarding what to tell and how to tell it. Miss Lyman has had experience as a librarian and also as a trained story-teller, whose work is in demand throughout the country by groups of parents and teachers who have been delighted by the charm of her method. She considers in eight chapters the whole subject of children's stories, and then gives a series of examples that will be found invaluable, dealing as they do with biographical materials and national epics. Even if one had no interest in the telling of stories, the recounting in vivid form of the great tales of Robin Hood, Roland, the Cid, King Arthur and Sigurd would make the book fascinating reading for any one. It is provided with a list of books suggested for the story teller and has an introduction by Professor H. L. Willett. (Chicago: A. C. McClurg and Co., 1910, Pp. 325, $1.00 net.)

HISTORY OF OLD TESTAMENT CRITICISM. The Putnams are issuing a series of works on the history of the Sciences. The latest volume to appear is that by Professor Archibald Duff on "Old Testament Criticism." The writer is admirably fitted for his task. With deep sympathy he interprets the entire series of critical movements, beginning with the work of the prophets of Israel in the eighth century B. C., and traces the critical activity through the Old Testament days, the period of Judaism, the life of Christ and the times of the apostles, and the history of Jewish and Christian scholarship. Dr. Duff finds the story not merely interesting, but significant as a proof of the growth of religion from lower to higher levels. Every advance has been from theory to reality, from tradition to fact. The work is embellished with the portraits of some of the chief workers in the field of criticism, including Wellhausen, Cheyne, Duhm, Vatke, Stade, De Wette, Budde, Ewald. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1910, pp. 193. 75 cents net).

A NEW HEAVEN AND A NEW EARTH, by Charles Brodie Patterson. This is one of those well-meaning, unscientific works which belong to the vast transient literature of the "new thought" fad. The body was created by the soul—Death will cease to be. There is a "Fourth Dimension" in which we may communicate with the dead. These are some of the assertions made. On page 142 directions are given for passing into this "Fourth Dimension." You lie flat on your back and "direct the thought first to the right hand, then quickly think the force from the right hand up the arm and shoulder, down the chest to the solar plexus, the center of the physical body." Again, the possibilities of controlled breath action cannot be overestimated." The author believes in telepathy but not in hypnotism! Yet he is a well-meaning gentleman and lives in Florence, Italy. (New York. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. Pp. 286.)

THE EARLY RELIGION OF ISRAEL, Under the general editorship of Dr. Ambrose W. Vernon, the Houghton Mifflin Company is publishing a series of helpful volumes on Religious Problems, of which three or four have already appeared. The present work is by Professor Lewis B. Paton, of Hartford Theological Seminary, whose earlier works on the history and geography of Palestine have become familiar to students. In the volume now in hand, Professor Paton covers in five chapters the primitive, patriarchal, mosaic, settlement and early monarchy periods of the Old Testament. With a wealth of comparative material taken from the other Semitic groups, he illustrates the story of Israel's earlier religious beliefs and practices, and makes clear many of the obscure statements of the Old Testament. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1910, pp. 115. 50 cents net.)

THE ETHICS OF JESUS, by James Stalker, D. D., This is the work of a thorough careful scholar. He recognizes that Jesus is first of all a Teacher of ethics, of character-building. He shows in this work the ethical teachings of Jesus in the synoptic gospels. After a preliminary survey of the field of ethics, he takes up the works of Jesus as they bear upon the Highest Good, Virtue and Duty. The author is not the victim of mere words or phrases but goes to the heart of the subject. He questions, for example, whether "the kingdom of God" is likely to come into general use as the name for Christianity. "To the common ear it has a forced and foreign sound." The book is thoroughly devotional in spirit and is a happy illustration of the spiritual fervor of a great and learned mind. (New York: A. C. Armstrong & Co. Pp. 403.)

RELIGION IN THE MAKING—A Study in Biblical Sociology, by Samuel G. Smith.—The author is Professor of Sociology and anthropology in the University of Minnesota, and was led to write this book through teaching a Sunday-school class. The field of Biblical sociology is a rich one and is made to yield many suggestive results in this instance. The idea of one God is considered as the greatest contribution of the Hebrews, though much importance is attached also to their conception of righteousness. Among other interesting topics treated are: Sacred Persons, Priests and Prophets; Sacred Places, the Altar, High Places, Temple, Synagogue; Sacred services, Sacrifice, Fasting; Sacred Objects and Sacred Days. (New York. The Macmillan Company. Pp. 253.)

LATTER DAY SINNERS AND SAINTS. Edward Alsworth Ross contributes a little volume to the "Art of Life" series, of which Edward Howard Griggs is the editor. The world has changed so much that older categories of sin and sainthood have ceased to be effective. A new standard is required. Many things that saints did not do in the Middle Ages are a part of their necessary task today, such as social reform and political effort. Likewise sin has changed its appearance and masqueraders in guises hardly to be recognized by the orthodox of a few generations ago. The book is an interesting comment upon modern life from the standpoint of the ideal. (New York: F. W. Huebsch, 1910, Pp. 68, 50 cents net.)

THE NEW BIBLE COUNTRY. The work of interpreting to the middle-aged and older men and women of our generation the changes that have come about in the view of the Bible as the result of historical and literary study needs to be done by every minister and teacher. Professor Thomas F. Day of the San Francisco Theological Seminary has spoken suggestively on this theme in an address which compares the old Bible country with the new, and the desirability of coming over from the old to that in which the world of the future is destined to live. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Co., 1910, Pp. 32, 50 cents net.)

THE ERRORS OF MIND HEALING, by R. Willman. The author is a physician and writes for members of the profession. He treats of the diseases in the case of New Testament miracles, such as paralysis, blindness, deafmutism, possession, etc. The purpose is to show why Jesus worked miracles. It was not to establish a new method of curing disease but to prove his divinity. On this basis criticism is passed upon Dowieism, Theosophy, Christian Science, Emmanuelism and other forms of spiritual healing. The treatment is rather fragmentary and dogmatic. (St. Joseph, Mo.: Advocate Pub. Co. Pp. 179.)

ASPECTS OF CHRIST. The new principal of Mansfield College, Dr. Fairbairn's successor, has introduced himself to the wider constituency of the Christian church beyond the college with a stimulating work, which deals successively with the interpretations of Christ found in the synoptic Gospels, the writings of Paul, of John, of the apocalypse, in the creeds, in the Reformation period, and today. This is familiar ground to the reader of recent religious literature. But the treatment is suggestive and the outlook broad. (New York: Hodder and Stoughton, 1910, pp. 276, $1.50 net.)

THE PATH OF HONOR, by Burton E. Stevenson. Dumas made the period of the French Revolution the setting for so many of his stories, that it lends itself easily to the pen of the narrator and the entertainment of the reader. The adventures of one Jean Tavernay are told in thrilling manner, and the oft-interrupted romance that finally reaches a happy culmination. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. Pp. 313. $1.50.)

In a moment he would read a verdict in their faces and he was, strangely enough for a man so experienced, more concerned with the verdict than he cared to admit. He had felt an insatiable desire to pull the young "shave-tail" from his saddle and slap his face, but restrained himself with the thought of a coming day. Choking back his anger and forcing himself to be quiet, he returned the gaze of those glorious eyes with a level fire from his own fine grey ones. But it was a supreme effort to do so, for his rapidly beating heart revealed to him his real anxiety for a favorable sentence.

It was a most damning one.

"You deserve our thanks as American women," she said, her voice cold with loathing. "I've never seen so brutal a man as that one in grey. Had we not better drive on, dear Miss Carroll? We're on duty at six, you know."

With a grinding rattle the victoria gathered momentum and went whisking down the sun-baked street, leaving the guard still agape with admiration, the Provost-Marshal bowing elaborately and the young correspondent nursing a wound that would have received no balm even had he been able to overhear the response of Miss Carroll as she settled back into her spacious cushions.

"Benicia, that young man in grey has been ill. His face was dreadfully drawn. I wish I might nurse him a little. I'm sure he's not so villanous as the Provost has led us to believe."

CHAPTER V.
"Grilled."

There are only three cool spots in Ilo-Ilo in the late afternoon. One of these is the high, spacious veranda of the shabby old Nurses' Home next the Brigade Hospital. Foiled by the narrow street and a cunning trick of architecture, the sun here jealously surrendered a few square yards to cool shadows, through which passed from time to time a whiff of air stirring from out the sultry Strait.

As a consequence, the "hoi polloi" of the town passing drearily over the hot pavements below the veranda would often glimpse above them the draperies of such nurses as were off duty and more often than not a showing of officers' uniforms as well.

One of the most acute tortures of Rainier's career became associated with that social oasis in the Ilo-Ilo desert. He had been marched ignominiously on from the incident of the victoria through the clotted houses of the lower town. And what a dance these same houses seemed to be doing in the fevered mind of the prisoner! He was relieved to pass them all at last and come out over the sand-spit to the casemates of the old Spanish fort. A man in good health may stand the exasperating slant of the five o'clock sun searching his neck, with some equanimity, but to Rainier it was an ordeal never to be forgotten as he halted at the challenge of a soldier at the gate.

He and Garrison inherited a cell in common. But he was hardly aware of it. Dazed and near to unconsciousness, he felt the coolness of the shadowed room and crumpled to the floor before he could guide his shaking limbs to the nearest cot. The Corporal had followed him in and caught him as he went down. Another soldier had unharnessed Garrison and he bent over the prostrate, gasping correspondent cursing solicitously.

"Heat," grunted the Corporal with concern. "Heat an' brutality," responded Garrison with an oath. "He's finished, too. Ice fo' his head an' soup fo' his stomach, an' if yo' boys ain't the same breed as yo' officer yo'll git it heah pronto."

Rainier's last conscious moment told him that he was being lifted tenderly and placed carefully upon a creaking canvas cot. Then the keen zig-zaging pains in his head became a maddening whirl of delirium and he lost all touch of rational circumstance, becoming simply a frenzied mentality spinning through space horribly afraid, traveling on and on, interminably twisting and rising, until, after apparent hours of horrid dark dizziness, of acutest mind-torture, a blessed nothingness came and he slept.

The sun went down outside in the Jolo Sea, the night breeze drew in, cool and steady, across the Point, the stars solemnly swung their holy lamps until the dawn extinguished them and only the strident call of the morning bugle stirred him back to consciousness.

His first morning fact was a hot drink of the Gods of Health. He opened his eyes to a room dark still, but a streak of the dawn grey at the grating gave him his bearings and betrayed the looming of an indistinct figure bending over him. Presently there came a voice. It was not Garrison's:

"You're feeling better, sir."

There was an assuring quiet comfort in that voice in the grey dawn.

"I think I am," said Rainier gratefully. "Thanks for that hot stuff. You are from the Hospital Corps, I presume?"

"Not quite. Army Y. M. C. A. I'm the sole professional religionist on the Island of Panay."

"Y. M. C. A. down here in this musty corner of the earth!" Rainier's voice, though weak, showed no slight astonishment.

"Surely," said the quiet attendant. "Government forgot to supply these new regiments with chaplains, so some of us amateurs had to take hold. Are you interested in that sort of thing?"

Rainier was for an instant suspicious that he was being tricked into a religious conversation. But the voice of the Y. M. C. A. fellow was so matter of fact that he seemed to deserve a straight answer.

"Do you mean in religion, church,—that sort of thing?"

"Well, not exactly." The voice was deprecatory, almost confidential. "You see my work is hardly preaching. I write letters for the sick fellows, handle the money of the tempted fellows on pay-day, stock up the garrisons with games and books, and give a straight talk when it's needed. Sometimes it's minstrel shows, sometimes it's a 'gospel sing' to pull the boys away from the 'bino-joints.' General moral roustabout for the whole brigade. Catch the idea?"

"That sounds good to me," said Rainier with emphasis, trying to get an idea of his companion's face, but failing.

"What's the time?"

The Y. M. C. A. man lit a match over his watch, it's momentary gleam showing a singularly boyish face.

"Five-thirty," he decided, snapping the case. "You came in here yesterday afternoon, you know. It will be light soon now. Feel feverish?"

"Five-thirty," repeated Rainier slowly. "What are you staying up all night with me for?"

"Why, you're one of my crowd now, you know—one of my flock. That's the word, isn't it?" The Y. M. C. A. man spoke lightly enough.

"Much obliged, friend. You are a Christian," said Rainier with a stir in his heart.

A sudden thought occurred to his clearing mind. "Isn't Garrison here near me somewhere?"

"Rod is asleep over in the corner. Can't you hear him? Listen."

Garrison was evidently sleeping heavily, for his regular breathing came so loudly to Rainier's ear that a suspicion formed.

"Drinking?" he queried in a whisper.

"Drunk," echoed the visitor gently. "One of the guard passed him in a bottle last night. He got paralyzed about midnight. That's why they sent over for me."

"Too bad," growled Rainier.

"Yes, but he's got the makings of a king left in him yet. When you get around we—you and I— will have to combine on Rod. I think, together, we can land him. By the way, you're a Methodist?"

Rainier was not too weak to chuckle.

"Not a Methodist—not much of anything. Away back in America among the church spires I used to be a sort of honorary Baptist."

"Well, that relieves me. So long as you're lined up with him, you know. He's the one to get close to in this country. The man who is sheepish about his religion down in this country is the worst sort of a fool. He needs his Master down here. Well, I must be going. I'll see you shortly. My name is McBurney. Good-bye, Rainier. I'll have you out of this hole by night. I want you up with me. Don't worry about yourself or Rod. Adios."

Rainier heard the clang of the door behind McBurney, listened to the distant sound of his dying steps, and reminded himself philosophically that he was still in prison and laying up for himself splendid material for future copy. His head was clearing up and he felt like a very weak but much improved man. Best of all he was hungry. After all, the worst fact of the present moment was the plight of his fallen friend Garrison, whose latest lapse was evidenced not only by his stentorous breathing but by a sickening odor of 'bino' that filled the gloomy casemate.

In a half hour more Rainier found himself willing to arise and was much relieved to find his arms and legs tolerably obedient to him. A soldier came to the grating of the now fairly illuminated cell and gazed stolidly at him while he worked himself into clothes. Starting to fasten his shoes gave him a taste of dizziness but otherwise he felt much better, and was soon fully dressed and sitting soberly in his cot listening to Garrison's breathing and looking out into the court yard of the old prison where figures of soldiers and natives were beginning to stir around preparatory for breakfast. He felt pleasantly exhilarated by a whiff of boiling coffee that came to him.

Theme for the Day.—Love of the Highest.

Scripture.—Thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. Deut. 6:5.

Ah, my God,
What might I not have made of thy fair world,
Had I but loved thy highest creature here?
It was my duty to have loved the highest;
It surely was my profit had I known;
It would have been my pleasure had I seen.
We needs must love the highest when we see it.
—Tennyson ("Guinevere.")

Prayer.—Our God and Father, we crave the love that expands and enriches life. We know that this can come to us only as we choose the object of our love aright. Therefore we would love the Lord our God with all our hearts, and we cannot fail to the highest object of love. We would make this day one of true enjoyment, our Father. In the hour of prayer we would put from us all that speaks of other things, and abide content with the companionship of heaven. And so we would prepare ourselves for its joys. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12.

Theme for the Day.—Forward!

Scripture.—Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward. Ex. 14:15.

I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ. Phil. 3:14.

March on, my soul, nor like a laggard stay!
March swiftly on. Yet err not from the way
Where all the nobly wise of old have trod—
The path of faith made by the sons of God.
Follow, and honor what the past has gained;
And forward still, that more may be attained.
—Henry Van Dyke ("Song of a Pilgrim-Soul").

Prayer.—Divine Father, though we do not see Thee with the eyes of the flesh, yet we perceive Thy presence when in the crises of life we turn to Thee for aid. Be Thou with us in all the pilgrim journey that we take. Lead us in a straight path, and divide the waters before our feet that we may come safely through. We would not stop, nor turn aside to ways that go astray. But right onward would we make our journey, till the goal is reached, and we are at home with Thee. This we make our petition in Jesus' name. Amen.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13.

Theme for the Day.—The Certainty of Coming to Our Own.

Scripture.—For the vision is yet for the appointed time, and it hasteth toward the end, and shall not lie; though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not delay. Hab. 2:3.

I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand. John 10:28.

I stay my haste, I make delays,
For what avails this eager pace?
I stand amid the eternal ways,
And what is mine shall know my face.

The stars come nightly to the sky;
The tidal wave unto the sea;
Nor time, nor space, nor deep, nor high,
Can keep my own away from me.
—John Burroughs ("Waiting").

Prayer.—It is of Thy mercies that we live and move and have our being, our Father in heaven. Day by day we receive from Thee the gifts by which life is made profitable to us. Yet there are greater blessings to which we aspire. We have visions of the future far beyond all we have known. And we trust Thee for these good things to come. Our Savior has told us that we shall not be taken from his care, and that we cannot fail of our highest desires. For these assurances we give Thee thanks, and we pledge ourselves to ever more earnest service in Thy name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Theme for the Day.—The Soul's Cry for God.

Scripture.—I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant. Psalm 119:176.

But the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which we cannot utter. Rom. 8:26.

Because I seek Thee not, oh seek Thou me!
Because my lips are dumb, oh hear the cry
I do not utter as Thou passest by,
And from my lifelong bondage set me free!
Because content I perish, far from Thee,
Oh seize me, snatch me from my fate, and try
My soul in Thy consuming fire! Draw nigh
And let me, blinded, Thy salvation see.
—Louise Chandler Moulton ("Help Thou Mine Unbelief").

Prayer.—Dear Lord, we are all too little moved to speak to Thee, though we feel our need of prayer. We remain silent, and miss the chance to know Thy power and love. We beseech Thee to come and take possession of us, even though we do not ask Thee. We are athirst for God, for the Living God, and yet we do not drink of the river of Thy mercy. Turn us unto Thee, O Lord. Look upon us in compassion and cause Thy face to shine upon us, and we shall be saved. We pray in the Master's name. Amen.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15.

Theme for the Day.—Light at Evening Time.

Scripture.—It shall be one day which is known unto Jehovah; not day and not night; but it shall come to pass, that at evening time there shall be light. Zech. 14:7.

When, like a changing dream,
The long cloud-wedge,
Brown-gray,
Grew saffron underneath, and ere I knew,
The interspace, green-blue—
The whole, illimitable, western, skyey shore,
The tender, human, silent sunset smiled once more.
—R. W. Gilder ("Sunset").

Prayer.—Into the light of this another day Thou hast brought us, good Father, and we thank Thee for Thy care. We need Thee every hour of our lives. We try in vain to satisfy ourselves without Thee, for we are Thine offspring, and our souls long for Thy love. Abide with us all through the day, we pray Thee, that we may not be friendless and alone. And when evening shadows come and the sunset makes glorious the west, may we count it a sign of the evening of life, when by Thy blessing it shall be light. Amen.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16.

Theme for the Day.—The Unspeakable Glory.

Scripture.—Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. 1 Cor. 2:9.

And heard unutterable words. 2 Cor. 12:4.

How speech must fail, seeking to circumscribe
The purport of His mighty message here
With unavailing words; as if one dipped
A hand to empty deep, green Galilee.
—Edwin Arnold ("The Love of God and Man").

Prayer.—Our Father, there have been moments in our lives when heaven seemed very near, and we were inspired with the sense of divine things about us. We believe that such good moments of vision and happiness might be oftener ours if we lived closer to Thee, and listened for Thy voice. Thou art so great that we stand in wonder at the least of Thy works. Give us courage and faith to enter more deeply into the mystery of Thy glory, and to bring the secret to our fellow men. In Jesus' name we ask. Amen.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17.

Theme for the Day.—Here—and There.

Scripture.—Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. 1 John 3:2.

What we, when face to face we see
The Father of our souls, shall be,
John tells us, doth not yet appear;
Ah! did he tell what we are here!

A mind for thoughts to pass into.
A heart for loves to travel through,
Five senses to detect things near,
Is this the whole that we are here?
—Arthur Hugh Clough ("Through a Glass Darkly").

Prayer.—Our good Father, we are thrilled with the thought of the honor Thou hast shown us in calling us Thy children. We know that it is only because of Thy mercy and willingness to overlook our faults and weakness that we are named by Thy name. But we are inspired by this love of Thine to covet still higher glory in the life to come. It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but if we can obtain the image of our Master, we shall be satisfied. In his name we pray. Amen.

Continue the Daily Altar

Dear Dr. Willett: I certainly hope the very helpful "Daily Altar" department will be continued, and when the book is brought out I want at least two copies. One of the real needs of our people is training in devotion.

Jamestown, Ohio. ELLA SYPHERS.

Editors of Christian Century: Continue the "Daily Altar." It is most inspiring and helpful to me as I strive to come into the closer fellowship with the Father. I want to commend you for the noble work that you are doing towards arousing the brotherhood to a consciousness of the "great forward movement within its borders." The Christian Century is great. It is an inspiration to us to do our very best in our work for Christ. It is helping us to be a more devotional and worshipful people. God bless you in your work.

Olive Hill, Mo. R. S. HOWETH.

Editors Christian Century: By all means continue the "Daily Altar." The short prayer at the close of each day's devotions reminds me so much of what the disciples said to the Master, "Teach us to pray." There is one regret that I have to make and that is I don't read them as diligently as I ought. Also put me down for the book when printed.

Washin'-Day.

It's washin'-day at our house
An' this is how I tell:
It comes right after Sunday
An' it has a sudsy smell.

An' father's in a hurry
An' mother's tired out,
An' ev'ry one's jes' awful cross
An' don't want me about.

So I take Teddy an' my doll
An' we go off an' play
That ev'ry day is Chris'mas,
An' the' ain't no washin'-day.

The Birthday Lady

BY MISS Z. I. DAVIS.

They were having a lovely time at the party. The table was set under the trees in the Evergreen Park ready for the guests when dinner should be served. There was a centerpiece of crimson dahlias. The gold flowered dishes shone under the pencils of sunlight that marked their lines through the tall firs above.

"Now it is my turn to hide the thimble," was Bessie Lees' reminder as she took Gladdis' new ring in her plump little fingers. It was a plain gold band, marked with her initial and age which was thirteen that day. She was so pleased with her papa's gift that when the girls had asked, "Can we play bimity bomity about so high," she had answered, "Yes, with my ring in the place of the thimble. Mamma said I had better keep it on my finger, but I guess she will not care if we play this game with it. "

"One, two, three, ready," called the leader, "Seek the thimble."

Immediately ten pair of bright eyes uncovered and began searching up and down, around and beneath for the hidden treasure. "Ha, ha," laughed Bessie, "how cold you all are," as they grouped about a bunch of lush green moss. "Look out. You are growing warmer now," she exclaimed as Gladdis approached a lower limb of an apple tree that had edged its way up among the pines. Just how it came there was not known, but a guess was made that years ago a bird had dropped a seed there and it had sprouted and grown up from that small beginning.

Suddenly Bessie uttered a short, sharp scream as she sprang forward to draw Gladdis' hand back. "What is the matter?" asked the girls all at once in excitement.

"I hung the ring on that little twig," she explained, "and Gladdis jarred it so that it dropped off into that hollow." Bessie pointed to the fissure that ran downward through the trunk. Presently a sober faced little girl began to climb until she reached the lower branches.

Perching herself between the limbs, she rolled up her sleeve and was just about to thrust her arm down into the opening when her mother called.

"Come to the house at once, daughter."

"Pretend not to hear," suggested one, as a frown clouded the face of the birthday lady. Two voices were talking very loud and fast inside. "Stay a few minutes longer, and you will find the ring. Then your mother need never know you took it off," urged one. "Children, obey your parents," insisted the other, reminding her of her memory verse at Sunday-school. "Jesus, help me," she whispered.

"I must go and see what mamma wants," and she slid down with a cheerful face. Then the girls knew that a silent victory had been

"Dear child," began her mother, "can you stay with baby while I go down town to the jeweler's? He has just sent word over the telephone that the agent for whom I have been waiting a month, has come. He has the chafing dishes and I want to go down and select one. He comes in on one train and leaves on the next. I am sorry to ask you to do this on your birthday, but you know it is for papa's surprise."

swer, but the stern monitor whispered, "Honor thy father and thy mother." "Yes, I will tend baby brother," was the pleasant reply.

"Dinner can wait until I return, and taste all the better for your patience," smiled mamma as she kissed her good bye.

in hurried and broken sentences.

"How sorry I am it is lost," was the grave

"I—I was naughty," stammered Gladdis as a gloved hand rested on the door knob. Then followed her confession about the lost ring reply. "But I am glad you have told me about it without trying to deceive me."

It was nearly three o'clock before mamma came home and the guests were very hungry. Each one in turn had tried to find the ring, but without success. Baby Glen was asleep and the girls could not play inside for fear of disturbing him. Gladdis had to sit by the cradle and watch him for her mother had told her if she left him alone he might fall out.

When mamma came, little Glen opened his eyes and began to coo a welcome.

"Here is another present, but I do not deserve it," said Gladdis, unwrapping the package at her plate as they were seated around the table. She held out a beautiful morocco bound Bible. "Thaank you, dear mamma. It is just what I want," she exclaimed.

"This is because you told me about the lost ring," was the gentle reminder. "When the agent heard about your disappointment, he sent this to you with his best wishes, for his own little girl is just your age."

"It pays to be good," was Gladdis' happy exclamation. "I am glad that I came when you called me."

"You are a birthday princess, for you were brave enough to confess that you did wrong and you were willing to do a hard thing.

"There's nothing so kingly as kindness, There's nothing so royal as truth," smiled mamma sweetly.

A Story of Boys

One day a poor old woman drove into town in a rickety spring wagon. She tied her horse to a post near the school house. It was about as bad looking an old horse as you ever saw.

The woman hobbled away with feeble steps to sell a few eggs which she had in a basket. Just as she was out of sight the bell rang for the noon hour, and a crowd of jolly, noisy boys rushed out of the school house

"Halloa! See that horse!" Ho! ho! ho! Who ever saw such a looking thing?"

"As thin at a rail."

"You can count all his ribs."

"Looks half starved. Say, bony, is there enough of you left to scare?"

Two or three boys squealed in the ears of the horse, and gave him small pokes; others jumped before him to try to frighten him.

"Let's lead him 'round to the back of the building and tie him there, so that when the folks he belongs to come, they'll think he's run away."

"He run away!"

"Say, boys," put in another, "how about the lesson last Sunday? Isn't a horse as good as a sparrow? He looks half starved—yes, more than half, I should say. And we all know it isn't good to feel that way since the day we got lost in the woods nutting."

The boys stopped their teasing and began to look at the horse with different eyes, while one of them brushed the flies off him.

"Look here, boys, I wish we could give him something to eat while he's standing."

"Can't we?"

"A real bang-up good dinner, such as he hasn't had for a century, by the looks of him."

"Let's do it. I've got a nickel."

"I've got two cents."

More cents came in. The man at the feed store contributed a nearly worn-out bag, and in a few moments the poor old horse was enjoying a good meal of oats.

By the time he had finished it the old woman came back, her basket filled with groceries, for which she had exchanged her eggs.

The old woman was helped in as if she had been a queen. And every boy's heart glowed as the quivering voice and dim eyes bore a burden of warm thanks as she drove away.

Those were every-day school boys. There are millions and millions like them, only they do not quite realize what a spirit of loving kindness dwells in their hearts.—Sunday-school Advocate.

A Little Nonsense

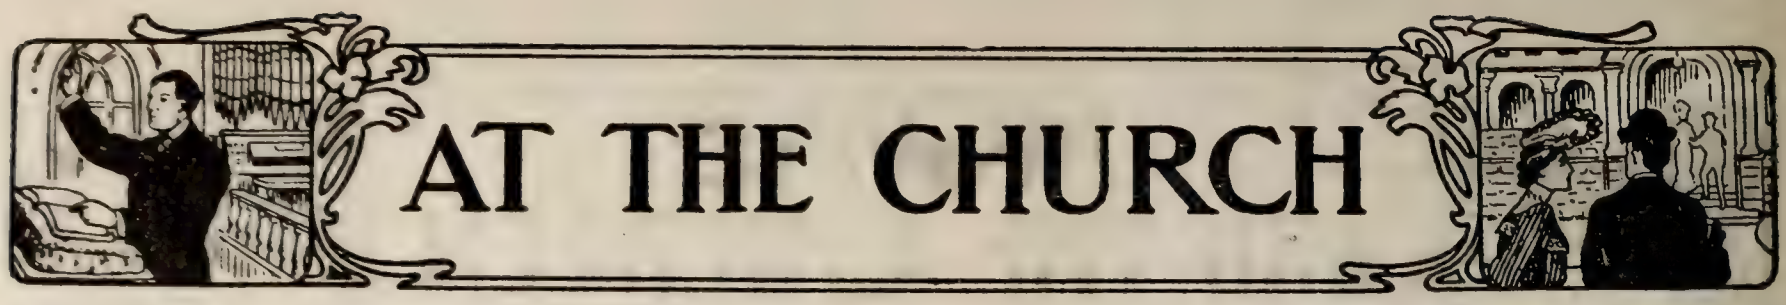
A Poet's Rank.—Richard Le Gallienne, the poet, was entertaining a group of magazine editors at luncheon in New York.

To a compliment upon his fame Mr. Le Gallienne said lightly:

"But what is poetical fame in this age of prose? Only yesterday a schoolboy came and asked me for my autograph. I assented willingly. And today at breakfast time, the boy again presented himself.

"'Will you give me your autograph, sir?' he said.

"'But,' said I, 'I gave you my autograph yesterday.'



"'I swopped that and a dollar,' he answered, 'for the autograph of Jim Jeffries.'" —New York Tribune.

Why Boys are Brave.—To his teacher's request that he give the class ideas on the subject of "Bravery," little Johnny delivered himself of the following:

"Some boys is brave because they always play with little boys, and some boys is brave because their legs is too short to run away, but most boys is brave because somebody's lookin'."—Brooklyn Life.

Considerate.—Magistrate (to Prisoner)—"If you were there for no dishonest purpose, why were you in your stockinged feet?"

Prisoner—"I 'eard there was sickness in the family."—Punch.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Risen Christ*

The resurrection of Jesus was the ground on which the early church based its claim that he was the Messiah, who had come for the redemption of his people. His conquest of death was to them the outstanding proof of the claims he had made for himself, and of the value of the program he had announced for his followers and for all the world.

The resurrection is the only adequate explanation of that marvelous revival of confidence and enthusiasm felt by the little community of believers after the terrible tragedy of Calvary. In fact, that one piece of evidence seems sufficient, for quite apart from all the testimony borne by the evangelists and the other writers of the New Testament, it is easy to see that unless some event had transpired to restore the hope of the disciples, the movement inaugurated by Jesus would have perished at his death.

Variations in the Narratives.

When this central fact of the revival of faith in his followers is taken into account, there is little need to puzzle over the perplexities into which the different narratives of the resurrection at once lead us. For there are real perplexities which have never been satisfactorily explained. Whether it was Mary Magdalen or the women of that faithful group that followed Jesus, who first saw him after his resurrection, who can say? Both statements are given. Was there one angel or were there two at the sepulchre? Did Jesus meet the disciples at Jerusalem or in Galilee? The latter was assuredly the statement to the women who went to the tomb. Yet Jesus seems to have appeared to the disciples repeatedly in Jerusalem in the days following that morning hour of surprise and joy.

No doubt these variations in the story were due to the freedom with which the whole transaction was handled by the early church. As it was told in certain circles, the resurrection was the return of Jesus in his physical form, precisely as he had been laid in the tomb. To others it was the appearance to the disciples of a partially glorified Jesus, who came and went in some mysterious way impossible to flesh and blood, and who could conceal his personality so that even his closest friends did not know him until he chose to make himself known.

Physical or Immaterial.

These two types of thought in reference to the return of Jesus from the grave are manifested side by side in the narratives of the four Gospels. It is useless to speculate as to which view is the nearer correct. We have to take the narratives as they stand, and attempt to go back not only to them but back of them to the fact which they struggle with only partial success to make clear to us. The fact was so tremendous that language broke down under the strain of its disclosure.

But the fact of the return of Jesus to the disciples is the one thing significant to the first generation of Christians. The different stories of his appearance to this one and that one rapidly took form in the Christian community. Some ten different interviews of this character are recorded in the Gospels and the writings of Paul. They include the appearance of Jesus to the women coming from the sepulchre, to Mary Magdalen, to Peter, in Jerusalem, to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, to the ten apostles in Jerusalem, to the eleven a week later in Jerusalem, to several disciples at the Sea of Galilee, to five hundred brethren at one time, to James, probably the Lord's brother, and to the apostles at Jerusalem. Later still, of course, we have the appearances to Stephen and to Paul.

Explanations Attempted.

Those who have attempted to explain away, the resurrection of Jesus have proposed various views, such as the theft of the body by the disciples and their pretense that Christ had risen; the removal of the body by Joseph of Arimathea without the knowledge of the disciples, the survival of Jesus from the agony of the cross, his return to consciousness in the sepulchre, and his appearance among his disciples; the purely visionary character of the appearance, the manifestation of Jesus to the minds of the believers by impressions which they interpreted as bodily manifestations, and finally the belief of the disciples in a physical resurrection resulting from a misconception of the meaning of mystical utterances about the union and communion of themselves with Christ.

These various views have appealed to different types of mind in varying ways. Some of them are so crude and impossible as to fall of their own weight. Perhaps no theory ever framed meets all the conditions of the event and gives a wholly satisfactory explanation of the conviction which presently became universal among the followers of Jesus, that he had returned to them from the grave and was forever the master of life and death.

Why Explain?

Apparently the early church did not consider any explanation of the resurrection in the least necessary. Hebrew thought dwelt so fully in the region of belief in physical resurrection as the only possible method by which the survival of death could be realized that it was natural this view should prevail in the church. Yet even Paul early recognized the disadvantage of a conception of resurrection which made it merely a physical revival from the grave, and he was at pains to show to the Corinthian believers that it was not the body put into the grave which came back again, but a different and more enduring body. How far he would have employed this view in explaining the experience of Jesus we have no way of knowing. He offers no explanation of that great fact, nor do any of the New Testament writers.

But the fact of the resurrection is quite independent of any labored attempt to explain its method. To the disciples there came the conviction that their Master had met and overcome the powers that bring all other men into subjection to the grave. It was therefore their supreme confidence that they too should share in the victory of those who bore his spirit. Life gained a new significance from the fact of Jesus' return to his people.

The first terrible conviction that the work of Jesus had failed proved to be blessedly untrue. It was evident that a new force had entered into human life which must henceforth be reckoned with. The shadow that throughout the centuries has rested upon humanity had now been lifted, and in the clear shining of the light of hope upon the soul of man there was the token of that supreme place in the universe for which he was destined in the providence of God. Jesus was but the first of those who were to break the power of death and pass beyond the range of physical limitation.

A Divine Necessity.

And one may well ask the question whether the resurrection of Jesus was not a kind of divine necessity in the moral order of things. It is of far less significance whether it was a miracle in the ordinary sense of the word, or the natural and inevitable survival of a life too significant and vital to pass under the dominion of death. Far more important is the fact that God has not left us without clear witness of the supremacy of the spiritual over all the limitations of human life. The debate between those who hold fast to the idea of a physical resurrection both for Christ and for his followers, and those who believe rather in a spiritual resurrection which is the foretaste of a nobler life for the soul in the days to come, will probably go onward as in the past. But the real meaning of the resurrection will lie in neither of these views alone.

Rather will the resurrection mean what it has always meant to the church,—the supremacy of Christ as the first conqueror of death, and the possibility that those who share his spirit may likewise enter into life unhindered of the grave. More than this, the resurrection has the present and perpetual value of making evident the progress day by day from the life of sin and selfishness to that of sacrifice and service. That was the nobler New Testament view. Death becomes but an episode in the career of the soul to its noblest realization. It rises from the old life to the new, as the price of companionship with Christ and of obedience to the divine will is paid.

The Risen Life.

If we, then, are risen with Christ, not from any literal grave, nor even from the emblematic grave of baptism, (though both of these ideas are helpful), but from the grave of unholy living, of wordly interest, and of selfish satisfaction, to the new life of activity in behalf of humanity and of joy in the ministries of the kingdom of God, we are to foster this new order of being by seeking ever more the things of the higher realm. This, it is, to know Christ, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his suffering. We become conformed unto his death when the life of selfish indulgence is crucified within us. We are already beginning to obtain the resurrection from the dead when the new interests of righteousness and holiness take first place.

And thus the resurrection continues and is renewed in the daily experiences of those choice and elect souls who are willing to walk with Christ, that they may take with him the upward way to eternal life.

Christian Endeavor

Topic December 18th: If We Really Love Jesus. Jno. 14:15-24.

Of course the first question is, Do we really love Jesus? For determining the true from the false, Jesus had one never failing test. He gave it to his disciples when he warned them against the false prophets. He reminded them that the test of the value of a fruit tree was the kind of fruit it bore. Nobody expects to gather grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles. The fact is, the good tree brings forth good fruit, and a worthless tree brings forth worthless fruit. "By their fruits ye shall know them." So, also, let the product of his labors determine whether a prophet be true or false. This also is the test of our love for Jesus Christ. Not that we say we do, anybody can say that, but we must prove it by living deeds.

Let us each put our lives to the test and see whether or not we really love Jesus, or whether ours is a formal lip service. Do we render a willing service in the various activities of the church? That is, do we take the place of service, singing in the choir, teaching in a Sunday-school, assisting the juniors, hustling up a Sunday-school class, assume a chairmanship of some committee, and in any of these work to the limit of the opportunity? Then we are keeping the commandments in part. But if we go to the service because the crowd goes there, because there is more personal gratification there than at any other place of which you can think at that time, if we repeatedly and persistently refuse to accept any responsibility, wishing at all time to be care free although at some time in the past we may have performed the ceremonial rites which admitted you into the church, judged by the standard which Jesus himself sets up—doing his commandments—we do not love him.

But there is much more to keeping the commandments of Jesus than taking a place in organized Christian work and filling it. It calls, also, for the making of our personal lives measure up to the Christian standard of righteousness, in the daily routine of affairs. The question is, Will I, as a clerk back of the counter, be courteous to the trade, and at once honest with the purchaser and with my employer? As teacher in the public school, do I recognize that my Christian ideal calls for a conscientious endeavor? Do we not see that this follows all our activities, in store and shop, school and society; indeed wherever our daily tasks may lead us.

There is one other realm in which we must demonstrate our love for Jesus,—our conscious efforts in behalf of others. Take from Jesus' life the unselfish service which he rendered while on earth and you have nothing left. His miracles, his parables, as well as direct precepts as in the Sermon on the Mount, abound with purpose and effort in behalf of others. And so long as there are unsaved people in the world, we who love Jesus must use our energy, intelligence, and love to woo and win others for the kingdom.

To such as love Jesus after this fashion comes the spirit of God and dwells in him.

A Visit to Our Mission Stations

Letter Number Five

BY SECRETARY F. M. RAINS.

A WEEK IN INDIA.

One week ago we reached India proper. We came over from Columbo, Ceylon, to Tuticorin, the extreme southern part of India. Prof. G. W. Brown, of the Bible College, Jubbulpore, arranged to meet us at Madura, a great Congregational mission. J. S. Chandler, of that mission, received us in a most cordial way and entertained us royally. There are no hotels in this city of more than one hundred thousand population. We found his large and well-ventilated bungalow a delightful place for rest. He has been a missionary in this station for thirty-seven years. He knows India thoroughly. This was an added advantage for us. This mission was planted seventy-six years ago. They have 22,000 members in this district. Twenty-five native evangelists are supported by the Indian churches, without any help from the American Board in Boston. Besides, they have some 200 native evangelists that are supported in part or in whole by mission funds. The mission owns fifty acres of land at Pasumalai, a suburb of Madura. On this land are to be seen no less than sixty different buildings for the great work being done, —schools, colleges, industrial, printing presses, etc., etc. It is a great sight. This is the largest and best equipped mission station I have ever seen. The property is worth about $750,000. In the city proper there is a great hospital that cost about $21,000, and every dollar of the money was raised in Madura. Some rich Brahmins gave. Besides, there is a woman's hospital and a woman's college, and also a large new college for men. J. D. Rockefeller gave the money for the latter.

One church building in this station is fifty years old. This is the home of Dr. John P. Jones, who wrote the famous book, "India's Problem—Krishna or Christ," probably the best recent book on India. Madura is a center of Hinduism. One temple here covers about thirteen acres of land. It has been some two thousand years in building and work in it still continues. However, there is a marked change in the attitude of the people in favor of Christianity and against the false religions. There are more than a thousand students in the schools and colleges of this mission.

At Madura I saw what is known as "Suttee Stones," that is, stones or small monuments

SOME STUDENTS AT JUBBULPORE BIBLE COLLEGE AND THEIR WIVES.

Girl's School at Harda, India.

that had been put up on the spot where a wife had burned her live body for her dead husband.

On our way north we passed through Trichinopoly, where Reginald Heber was buried. It will be remembered he wrote "From Greenland's Icy Mountains." Perhaps his song has done more for missions than the splendid years of service he gave in India.

We stopped for one day at Ahmednagar. Here, also, the American Board has a strong mission. It was started eighty years ago. There is one congregation in this ctiy of about 1,200 members. Their church building cost over $20,000. A distinguished Indian is the pastor and the church is no expense to the home board of course. The Congregationalists have done a mighty work and we can do the same if we will.

Part of a day was spent at Kedgaon, where Pandita Ramabai conducts her large mission for Hindu widows and children. It embraces a farm of some two hundred acres and a number of buildings costing many thousands of dollars. The number in this institution is about 1,500. Schools and industrial training are conducted here. What is known as the "Ramabai Association" is incorporated in the United States and a number of distinguished Americans constitute a board of managers, Lyman Abbott, editor of "The Outlook," being one of them. Ramabai gave us a very cordial reception. She states that her mission is "purely undenominational. evangelical, designed to reach and help high-caste Hindu widows, deserted wives and orphans from all parts of India." She was raised an orthodox Hindu, but at the age of twenty-two became a Christian through the work of missionaries. She has spent some time in England and America. Without question she is doing much to lift up her sisters in India. Imagine our surprise at meeting G. W. Coffman, formerly of Drake Uuiversity, at this mission. He is in charge of the large farm and is trying to introducee some improved methods. At one time he was associated with our own mission work in India. Mrs. Coffman is still in America but may return to India when her husband is permantly located here.

A stop of one night at Bombay enabled us to see something of the growth and progress of that city with a population of near one million. However, here we witnessed the most disgusting form of heathenism we have ever seen. This is where the Parsees have their "Towers of Silence." In these large towers they place the bodies of their dead to be consumed by vultures. We saw scores of buzzards on the trees and walls of the towers. Their theory is that the earth ought not to be defiled by the bodies of the dead. The strange thing is that this hideous and gruesome practice is permitted within the corporated limits of so progressive a city as Bombay. It is encouraging to know that there are only about 100,000 Parsees in the world and about all of them live in or near Bombay.

It is about 1,000 miles from the extreme southern part of India to Hurda. The country is most beautiful. The soil is rich. The people live in small villages. Excepting the farm houses, the country looks much like Indiana or Ohio. There has been plenty of rainfall recently and the whole land looks prosperous. The train service is good and we are having a safe and profitable journey.

The Uncrowned King

A New Harold Bell Wright Book

The Uncrowned King is different from anything previously done by the author, but it is distinctively a Harold Bell Wright book. It is a beautiful piece of literary work, that is unquestionably, the expression of inspiration. It appeals to everything that is true, noble and wholesome within us, and we feel that the author has given us in this volume, an insight of the temple of truth in our own lives.

F. D. Ferrall has concluded a meeting with his congregation at Shenandoah, Iowa, during which 43 were added to the membership. Mr. Ferrall was assisted by Robert Noah in the singing.

Large attendance and deepened interest mark the success of the meetings at Muncie, Ind. held under the leadership of R. H. Crossfield of Transylvania University. Shop meetings are being held at noon during the week.

Clyde Darsie is leading a meeting with home forces at his church, Quincy, Ill. Mrs. Anna Atwater of Indianapolis delivered an address to the women of the congregation recently in the interest of missions.

There were fourteen accessions to First Church, Lincoln, Neb., on a recent Sunday. At a missionary rally held December 6, at this church, several missionaries were present and gave talks on their respective fields.

More than a thousand additions have been made in Charles Reign Scoville's meeting at Oklahoma City, Okla. J. H. O. Smith, the pastor there, is planning an active building campaign as a result of the meetings.

J. Will Walters closed his pastorate of two years at Sullivan, Ill., Dec. 1. He reports 164 added to the church in that time with a present membership of 964. Mr. Walters will do evangellstic work, residing in Nevada, Mo.

Your Friend-- The Christian Century

When you think of your friends to whom you wish to make Christmas presents, do not forget your constant and intimate friend—The Christian Century.

We feel so secure in your affection that we make bold to suggest what gift would please us most. We do not ask you to buy anything for us. But if you would devote a little of your time and get a list of new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY it would please us more than any other thing.

And this is a gift in which we could reciprocate. Your own paper would be more valuable to you; and your friends whose subscriptions you received—think how they would be benefitted throughout the year!

Christmas time offers an ideal opportunity for all the friends of The Christian Century who have on many occasions expressed their appreciation in words to express it in a practical deed. You can help make a greater paper, if you will.

Begin to talk with your friends now.

If you send a list of five or more you may have a good commission on each new subscription, if you wish it.

Two New Sunday-School Texts

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT CLASSES

Published in Connection With the Bethany Graded Lessons

THE LIFE OF JESUS
In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT

This Book Is Now In Press

It comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

Following is Professor Wakefield's Introduction to Dr. Scott's volume:

"Dr. Loa E. Scott has had long experience in school life, in college and university. She has been both student and teacher. She felt early and deeply that there was serious lack in the teaching of the Sunday-school. Poor provision was made for minds that were mature and purposeful; there was lack of such continuity as leads to definite and satisfactory results.

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"She is plainly doing a work that is called for in many and many a community. And if her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world." E. B. WAKEFIELD.

THE MORAL LEADERS OF ISRAEL
In Fifty-two Lessons

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Appearing Weekly in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.

For many years Dr. Willett's department treating of the International Uniform lessons has been one of the leading features of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. For 1911 there will be two important changes in this department.

1. Instead of following the Uniform lessons which are rapidly being abandoned by the best schools in favor of the Graded series, Dr. Willett will coöperate with the publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons in producing a course for young people's and adult classes, on constructive lines, in the field of Old Testament Prophecy. There is intense human interest today in those ancient prophets—the moral leaders of Israel.

The international Uniform lessons for next year deal with the same studies. While Dr. Willett's arrangement of the material will differ from that of the Uniform lessons, there will be many points at which the two series will be tangent to each other. Both the similarity and difference between the two courses will give added interest to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY course in schools where the Uniform lessons are used in whole or in part.

2. The other change in Dr. Willett's department is that while in the past the lessons have been prepared mainly as an aid to teachers, in the coming year they will be prepared for both pupils and teacher. Instead of the plain narrative form there will be variety of treatment, the use of questions and other pedagogical devices for giving point to each lesson. Dr. Willett will bring into use that well-known teaching gift which makes his university class room so constantly popular.

The publishers of The Christian Century propose to supply classes of six or more with weekly copies of the paper at $1 per year for each copy, or 30 cents per quarter. This, when one thinks of it, is an extraordinary offer. The class members will receive in addition to their Sunday-school lesson all the rich things provided every week in The Christian Century. The papers distributed to the class on Sunday will contain the lesson for the following Sunday.

Send your order through the regular Sunday-school Treasurer if you wish to pay quarterly; or deal directly with the Publishers, enclosing remittance at the rate of $1.00 per year for each copy ordered. Be sure and give name of teacher or class member to whom papers shall be sent for distribution.

In making plans for the New Year let all pastors and teachers and members of Bible classes, who read this announcement, bring it to the attention of their classes and arrange at once to be supplied with THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY and THE LIFE OF JESUS, for the first Sunday in January.

THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO.

Revival services are being held at Alvin, Ill., under the leadership of E. M. Norton.

A three weeks meeting closed recently at Norwood Ohio, where W. J. Shelbourne ministers. Mr. Shelbourne was assisted in the meeting by W. P. Crouch and Miss Ida Hanna, and much good was accomplished by the services.

The Sunday evening services at Lenox Avenue Church, New York, are growing in popularity, many outsiders being in attendance. A novel feature maintained by this church is a guest book, vistors at the services registering their names therein.

H. W. Hunter, pastor at Higginsville, Mo., is giving a series of parlor lectures under the auspices of the C. W. B. M. of that place in the hope of interesting the people of the town in the cause of missions. Korea, South America and the Moslem world are some of the subjects considered.

During the past year there have been 94 added to the membership at Washington, Kan. Under the leadership of the pastor, S. L. Jackson, the work is making good progress, the Sunday-school having increased from 40 to 119 and the financial affairs being in good condition.

The weekly leaflet of Central Church, Denver, Colo., George B. Van Arsdall pastor reports that 156 persons have been added to the church since Feb. 1 the date at which Mr. Van Arsdall became pastor. The mid-week service has had an average attendance of 100. The pastor calls his people "minister-makers."

C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, Mo., is assisting J. E. Davis, pastor, in a meeting at Beatrice, Neb. Mr. Chilton is very much sought after by churches wishing thoughtful, sound preaching, and the Beatrice church is fortunate in having this opportunity to hear his great message.

The magnificent new pipe organ, the gift of R. A. Long, which has just been installed in Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., was dedicated on November 25 by Prof. Edward Kreiser, who had composed the "March Triumphal" especially for this occasion. The organ cost about $22,000, and is one of the finest instruments in the West.

L. T. Faulders, who recently received a call to First Church, Kansas City, Mo., will probably remain at Wellington, Kan., in response to the wish of his congregation. Mr. Faulders has had a successful pastorate there, leading in the erection of a $20,000 church and a nearly doubled membership.

December 4 marked the beginning of the seventh year of the pastorate of Richard W. Wallace at First Church, Valdosta, Ga. During these past six years a house of worship has been completed, the church indebtedness paid, and the congregation doubled. The various missionary and benevolent offerings have increased from year to year and both pastor and congregation feel that it has been a time of spiritual enrichment.

The National Inter-Church Temperance Federation convenes in Washington, D. C., Dec. 9-11. Harry G. Hill of Indianapolis who is the President of the National Temperance Board of the Church of Christ is asked to represent our people on the program. The National Temperance Boards of eight leading denominations are active in the Federation, which thus represents the temperance sentiment of over 11,059,573 communicants.

The Sunday-school of the church at Tipton, Ind., held its annual rally on a recent Sunday, with four hundred and fifty present. There was no attraction other than the regular program of the school. Three classes broke their record for attendance on that day. The men's class, taught by the minister, G. I. Hoover, was one of these and had fifty men present, aside from a young men's class with thirty-two in attendance.

The Huntington, Ind., Sunday-school is working toward a goal of 600 in attendance at their rally day service. A device reading "R. U. A. Hobab?" is being attached to the coats of as many willing victims as the workers can find. No one seems to know what a "Hobab" is, but the secret will be out at the service. The editorial writer of this page confesses that he would like to be there to find out. Will Mr. Cole, pastor of the church, please inform our editors and readers what a "Hobab" is?

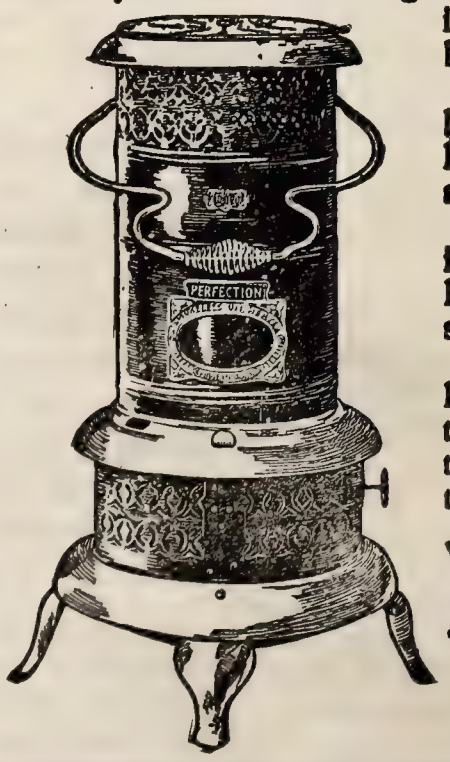
The annual report of Kirkwood Avenue Church, J. C. Tood pastor, shows total receipts $3680,12 and a balance on hand of $14. 57. We commend the balance on hand. Missionary offerings amounted to $943; Sunday-school offering $199; which with various other offerings make a total of receipts for the year $6,202.34. Mr. Todd begins a series of three sermons on Christian Science: The Founder of Christian Science, the Science of Christian Science, and the Christianity of Christian Science. W. J. Lhamon is to begin a meeting in this church January 1.

The East End Christian Church, Pittsburg Pa. is doing some high class educational work. The graded lessons are being used in the Sunday-school and a very fine group of teachers are at work. Col. S. H. Church is delivering remarkable lectures to a large class of interested men. Mr. Robt. Balderson and Mr. H. C. Young are guiding the thought of the Women's and Young Ladies' classes. Sixty young people are studying, "The Challenge of the City" and on Wednesday evenings about 80 people gather to study very carefully Mathews "Social and Ethical Teachings of Jesus." A Literary Club has also been formed. Thus this church under the leadership of John R. Ewers seeks to measure up to the educational demands of a modern congregation.

The Kirkwood Avenue Church at Bloomington, Ind. observed a "Bible Chair Day" on November 20th and took an offering for the Bible Chair to be opened at Indiana University. The offering amounted to $2400.00. This was a most liberal offering from a church of small financial ability. The church also has turned over to the Bible Chair a property worth about $7500.00 to be used as a home to the institution. This makes about $10,000.00 that the local church offers to this work. A large interest is taken by ministers and prominent laymen in Indiana. The board plans to raise an endowment of $60,000.00 for permanent maintenance. Any interested should address Joseph C. Todd, financial secretary at Bloomington.

The University Church at Bethany Neb., which is a suburb of Lincoln has just become a living-link in state missions. This church is a living link in the Foreign Society, supporting Mrs. Dr. Dye at Bolenge Africa. Recently the University Church agreed to give over five hundred a year for three years to Christian Education. H. O. Pritchard recently began the fourth year of his ministry there. This is a great church in every way. Its missionary offerings for the present year will approximate three thousand dollars. It has more student volunteers in its membership than any other church in America. During Mr. Pritchard's ministry the church has been double in membership and in all its giving, and in addition a beautiful and commodious forty thousand building has been erected.

On Tuesday evening, November 22, a dinner was given in the parlors of the Tipton, Ind.,



Temporary Heat Quickly

Did you ever stop to think of the many ways in which a perfect oil heater is of value? If you want to sleep with your window open in winter, you can get sufficient heat from an oil heater while you undress at night, and then turn it off. Apply a match in the morning, when you get out of bed, and you have heat while you dress.

Those who have to eat an early breakfast before the stove is radiating heat can get immediate warmth from an oil heater, and then turn it off.

The girl who practices on the piano in a cold room in the morning can have warmth from an oil heater while she plays, and then turn it off.

The member of the family who has to walk the floor on a cold winter's night with a restless baby can get temporary heat with an oil heater, and then turn it off. The

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

is invaluable in its capacity of quickly giving heat. Apply a match and it is immediately at work. It will burn for nine hours without refilling. It is safe, smokeless and odorless. It has a damper top and a cool handle. An indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font.

It has an automatic-locking flame spreader which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so that the wick can be cleaned in an instant.

The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, and can be quickly unscrewed for rewicking. Finished in japan or nickel, strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

church to the men of the congregation. The former pastors were invited to be present as the guests of honor for the evening. Robert Sellers of Elwood, Ind., and George W. Hemry of South Bend, were present in person, and L. E. Sellers of the First Church, Philadelphia, W. C. Bower of Los Angeles, L. H. Stine of Aberdeen, Miss., E. S. Conner and E. M. Blount of Indianapolis sent messages of greeting. The purpose of the banquet was to cement the fellowship of the men and to bring to their attention and consideration the great interests of the church. William Grant Smith, of Alexandria, spoke in behalf of the Adult Bible class movement, and Henry Sellers and James Burkhardt of Frankfort, on the general work of men in relation to the church. An original poem was read by A. L. Ferguson, entitled, "Sentinels of the Rockies." The dinner was served by the Ladies' Aid Society of the church and was a bounteous feast, to which one hundred and twenty men sat down. The occasion was one of the most enjoyable in the history of the Tipton church.

Oklahoma City's Marvelous Meeting

We are in a truly great meeting with the Disciples of Christ in Oklahoma City. The tabernacle, which is 125 by 140 feet has been packed to the uttermost on Sundays and the crowds have been something wonderful every night in the week. There has never been a small audience and there has never been a service without additions. There were 71 added yesterday, 201 last week, 1076 to date.

The largest meeting of the year was our meeting at little Rock, Ark., which closed last January with 1068 added, but this meeting has now surpassed that and has become the largest meeting of the first year of the new century.

The church board voted yesterday to continue services in the tabernacle after the meeting closes, probably taking off one wing on each side. They will line the tabernacle with building paper and Bro. Smith will hold his Sunday services in the tabernacle until the great, new building can be erected, thus the congregation will not go back to the old church at all. The old church will be moved to the northeast part of the city, establishing a new congregation there and then there will be four Churches of Christ here in a short time. The whole Brotherhood should be grateful for the spirit of consecration and push of our brethren in this city and everybody knows they have a great leader in J. H. O. Smith.

Yesterday was a cold, windy day and there were 631 at Sunday-school. A week ago a great contest between the young men's and young women's class closed and cards were sent to all members of the church and the Sunday-school was boomed to 1388, the young ladies' class having 350, and the young men 334.

The meetings have gone right on through one of the hottest political campaigns we have ever been in. But we entered right into the campaign feeling that the forces of right eousness should stand four-square for the cause of temperance and against the saloon interests. The meeting became a blessing to the state and our very zeal and fire in this work won friends for the King and His Kingdom. The State Legislature is assembled here now and a hot contest over location of the State Capitol building is on, but "The Lord of Hosts has armed the Right."

We were to begin at Topeka, Kans. last week, but I sent Bro. Minges up there and the brethren in the Topeka churches were loyal enough to say continue the meeting here and come to them in February, so the end is not yet.

Our Evangelistic Company consists of W. J. Minges, supt. Personal work; J. V. Baird, Musical Director; Mrs. Scoville, Soloist and supt. Woman's Meetings; Chas B. Hahn, who has charge of the boy's work, organizing the boys for aggressive work for boys, and while his work is a new one, it is one of the most important in the church. Not one church in a hundred is giving enough attention to boys. These young soldiers must be enlinsted in the army for service and given something to do. Mr. Hahn's services, like the others, are invaluable.

"While Paul plants and Apollos waters, God gives the increased.

Pastors, Sunday School Superintendents and Teachers!

You will wish to remember the families of your congregation or the pupils of your school or class at Christmas time. There is no token so appropriate as a tasteful, simple card with a gracious Christmas greeting on it. We have prepared this for you. The sentiment is printed in Two Colors on a heavy paper folder enclosed in a white envelope of fine quality.

A CHRISTMAS GREETING

DEAR FRIENDS: Once more the whole round world gathers about the Manger-Cradle in Bethlehem. How wonderful that the Saviour of the world came as a Child into a human home. How full of wonder the words: "Unto us a Child is born!" Childhood is forever more significant, motherhood more sacred, the Home itself a brighter center of Life and Love

On this good Christmas Day let us rededicate our homes to Him; let us resolve to lead the children in His Way; let us give the Bible its true place in the household; let us magnify love and friendship and service; let us cherish His Church and Kingdom; and let us bind all the influences of our lives about His feet

If this Greeting shall come to any who are sick, or burdened, or troubled, or absent from home, let it speak to every anxious heart of Christ's Peace

To one and all of you, and to all whom you hold dear, I send my heart's Greeting in His Name. May your portion of the Christmas Joy be truly plentiful—enough for you and for others beside

THE LIFE OF JESUS

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT

Just From the Press

It comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

Following is Professor Wakefield's Introduction to Dr. Scott's volume:

"Dr. Loa E. Scott has had long experience in school life, in college and university. She has been both student and teacher. She felt early and deeply that there was serious lack in the teaching of the Sunday-school. Poor provision was made for minds that were mature and purposeful; there was lack of such continuity as leads to definite and satisfactory results.

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"She is plainly doing a work that is called for in many and many a community. And if her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world." E. B. WAKEFIELD.

THE MORAL LEADERS OF ISRAEL

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Appearing Weekly in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.

For many years Dr. Willett's department treating of the International Uniform lessons has been one of the leading features of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. For 1911 there will be two important changes in this department.

1. Instead of following the Uniform lessons which are rapidly being abandoned by the best schools in favor of the Graded series, Dr. Willett will coöperate with the publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons in producing a course for young people's and adult classes, on constructive lines, in the field of Old Testament Prophecy. There is intense human interest today in those ancient prophets—the moral leaders of Israel.

The international Uniform lessons for next year deal with the same studies. While Dr. Willett's arrangement of the material will differ from that of the Uniform lessons, there will be many points at which the two series will be tangent to each other. Both the similarity and difference between the two courses will give added interest to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY course in schools where the Uniform lessons are used in whole or in part.

2. The other change in Dr. Willett's department is that while in the past the lessons have been prepared mainly as an aid to teachers, in the coming year they will be prepared for both pupils and teacher. Instead of the plain narrative form there will be variety of treatment, the use of questions and other pedagogical devices for giving point to each lesson. Dr. Willett will bring into use that well-known teaching gift which makes his university class room so constantly popular.

The publishers of The Christian Century propose to supply classes of six or more with weekly copies of the paper at $1 per year for each copy, or 30 cents per quarter. This, when one thinks of it, is an extraordinary offer. The class members will receive in addition to their Sunday-school lesson all the rich things provided every week in The Christian Century. The papers distributed to the class on Sunday will contain the lesson for the following Sunday.

Send your order through the regular Sunday-school Treasurer if you wish to pay quarterly; or deal directly with the Publishers, enclosing remittance at the rate of $1.00 per year for each copy ordered. Be sure and give name of teacher or class member to whom papers shall be sent for distribution.

In making plans for the New Year let all pastors and teachers and members of Bible classes, who read this announcement, bring it to the attention of their classes and arrange at once to be supplied with THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY and THE LIFE OF JESUS, for the first Sunday in January.

Christian Unity in Smaller Places

Further Discussion of the Village Problem

We are publishing this week the first installment of letters called forth by our editorial of November 10 on a practicable plan of Christian unity. It will be remembered that the editorial in question was a comment upon a communication from Rev. J. Fred Jones, the Secretary of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. In that letter Mr. Jones pointed out the most distressing phase of the present divided condition of the churches in America. He showed that the small town and the village are usually the scene of strife and rivalry known only in part elsewhere.

He suggested a campaign of unity in such places, not in the interest of the establishment of churches, for often there are too many churches already. Rather he urged the selection of suitable men who could carry to such places a message concerning the sin of division, the disaster wrought by the divided church, the waste of resources, the overlapping, the low grade of ministerial service secured in such conditions, and the opportunity for a more worthy and creditable representation of the Christian faith.

We have been greatly interested in the letters that have come to us commenting on this suggestion. Almost without exception, they have approved the plan with heartiness. In two or three instances the difficulties arising from local prejudices and the fear of loss to denominational prestige are pointed out. These difficulties we must of course expect. But they are as nothing compared with the gain of such an enterprise.

We are perfectly aware that the only men who could succeed in such a mission as this would be those who are consecrated to the idea of uniting the Christian forces we now have, rather than of turning such a campaign to the immediate profit of the Disciples of Christ.

There are some of our brethren who will, no doubt, object to any form of propaganda that does not contemplate the organization of churches and the erection of church buildings. This type of denominationalism, not to say sectarianism, is too deeply rooted in the hearts of some of our people to be easily rooted out. There are those to whom Christian unity means only our denominational success.

But there are many others, and the number grows daily, who are convinced that we shall never be able to secure the regard and good will of other Christians nor to promote the real idea of unity by such means.

We have the same duty to the unchurched and unevangelized sections of the cities and of the country at large that we have toward the regions of heathenism in which the gospel has not been preached. These obligations we share with all Christians.

But our duty to small towns and villages, where there are already sufficient Christian forces to master the situation if they were united in a common cause, is radically different. To put a new church into such places would, in most instances, be a sin. It would depend upon the weakening of other churches for whatever effectiveness it could attain. It is not by this method that we are to accomplish our mission in the world.

If, on the other hand, a man of earnestness, intelligence and tact could be sent to such a place to hold an "Institute of Christian Unity," under the auspices of the united churches of the place, or of the Young Men's Christian Association, or of the young people's societies, or even in a wholly independent way, we are convinced that notable good might be accomplished.

He would make no effort to proselytize, but rather to arouse a new sense of devotion to Christ, of joy in the work of building up his kingdom, and of reward in obedience to his supreme commands of unity and service. The right sort of man would disarm suspicion by the clear demonstration that he had nothing to gain personally or denominationally, but everything to gain if by his service with the Christian people of the place, the effectiveness of the churches might be increased.

We believe that a campaign of this kind would be as great a blessing to the churches as that of the Laymen's Missionary propaganda. Indeed, we expect to see, within a decade, a series of conventions held from coast to coast in the interests of Christian unity among the local churches in all towns and cities throughout the nation. If the Disciples do not foresee and prepare the way for this great campaign, it will be their fault and disgrace.

Why is it not possible for those who believe in such a campaign to undertake the work of securing its realization in at least one town of which they know? There are isolated Disciples in places where we have no congregation, who are probably working earnestly in the churches which they find most congenial. Why could not such Disciples undertake in their own towns such a simple organization of committees as should prepare for a series of addresses of this character?

The expense involved would be very small. Undoubtedly one of the churches could be secured for an auditorium. If not, then some other place of meeting. Plans could be made for a single address, or a series of addresses running through a week, or perhaps coming once a week for from three to six weeks. The matter could be financed with little difficulty.

And where should the speakers be found? They could be found wherever we have ministers who believe sufficiently in the ideal we have set forth to be willing to contribute a little time to its interpretation. We believe there are many such men in our churches. And if any local committee will undertake to organize such a series of gatherings, we will undertake to find a man who will offer his services, practically without remuneration, for the sake of making a contribution to a work so needed.

Of course it will take some vision, some faith and some courage, both on the part of the local committees and of the ministers who volunteer for such addresses. But we believe that there are plenty of men possessing these qualities who are available.

We appreciate the fact that nothing would so quickly discredit such efforts as the appearance of a denominational spirit in such a series of addresses. The man who undertakes this work must handle the great themes of our holy faith in the large and sympathetic way that the spirit of Christ would demand. He must have some fair appreciation of the conditions which he faces and the end he seeks. He must put first things first, and lay the supreme emphsis upon the spiritual, moral, social and economic aspects of Christian union.

He will not try to gather the local community into one church. He will disturb as little as possible the activities and agencies at work already. He will have wisdom enough to put the emphasis where the apostles placed it, upon the primitive faith, the primitive spirit and the primitive service. And by this we mean the faith, spirit and service which are the ideals of the twentieth century as well as the first.

There is much wisdom in the plea of Secretary Mercer of Ohio that the cause of unity now calls for a martyr—for a man worth killing.

What he means is not necessarily that some one shall shed his blood, but that some large-souled man shall break away from conventional denominational practice and pay the price of criticism and suspicion that he may establish the ideal of unity.

Illinois has many men who are worthy this kind of martyrdom. Conspicuous among them is the state secretary, himself, whose experience, vision, tact and character equip him for this sort of service. Illinois is an ideal field in which to undertake such a work.

The board would support the secretary if he made that his main business, as it is the main business of the Disciples of Christ.

The churches of Illinois would, we believe, give more money for the actual working out of such Christian union ideals than they now give for the establishment of new churches.

For such a campaign the times are ripe. For such a campaign the Disciples ought to be prepared. For such a campaign The Christian Century is willing to put forth any efforts, to assist in a work which we believe is second in importance to none now open to the Church of Christ.

Social Survey

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

Christian Science Socially Impotent

The death of Mrs. Eddy will set the magazine and weekly journals all to speculating on the probable future of Christian Science and to a restatement of the various estimates of its strength and the source of its power. Whatever may be found of its genesis, or thought of the reasons for its power, it cannot bear the light of criticism in an age when the dominant call to religion is that of social service. The very nature of the mysticism out of which it is builded forbids that it take large account of misery. It must deny pain and misery while social welfare work demands that they be soberly assessed and reckoned with as grim and terrible realities. It forbids the use of material palliatives while the social worker must found his success in the use of material helps. It can give no charity, for charity itself is a recognition of that which it seeks to banish from the mind. Its power is in the discovery it has made of the power of mind over matter. It does cure many, and eases multitudes more by enthroning the mind in its confident assertion of right to rulership over matter. It is a splendid protest against the materialism that followed the discovery of the truths of evolution, but it is the old case of one extreme begetting another. Out of it may come an enlarged understanding of the power of mind over body and a new phase to the art of healing, and for that reason it deserves sober study instead of unreasoning denunciation. It does much good and that good should be parted from the error in it and conserved. But howsoever one may add to his misery by brooding over it, and however much the mind may delude us into fancied troubles, the fact of misery remains, and sickness is no more to be denied than is death. The slum dweller may palliate his misery by a philosophy of sereneness, but he cannot make the sordid tenement a cottage or a mansion. The starving man may believe there is no materiality except in the error of our thoughts, but he will suffer the pangs of hunger just the same and it will not help him to use any process of disillusionment upon him. Christian Science makes men think all too little of others to thrive long in a social age. Its churches average far above the ordinary in wealth, but its charities are unknown.

British Democracy Scores Again

The present effort to further curtail the powers of the Lords in the government of the British people may not be a Liberal victory, but it is already a victory for Liberalism, even before the vote is completed. The Lords concede the Liberal demand that they surrender all right to interfere with money bills. This was the first right the Commons won in their age-long contest with the Lords for supremacy of people over artistocratic rule. Roseberry proposes that the membership of the Lords be curtailed and so reorganized as to destroy the hereditary principle, but not that it be made for less than life, neither elective. That does not affect the responsiveness of the chamber to popular demands and would only give new lease of life to an aristocratic branch in the government. Landsdown proposes that Lords and Commons meet in joint session to settle problems of moment. Of course this would give a continuous Tory majority, for whether Tory or Liberal control Commons, the Lords are always so overwhelmingly Tory that they would swamp any probable Liberal majority. So the Lord's proposals of reform are but shams when measured against the real issue. However, England is of very conservative temperament and may conclude to accept the easy step the Lords have proposed as the least they can expect and the most they are willing to give. Their astute political move in offering the referendum may appear to many a surer safeguard than the proposal of the Liberals to reduce the Lords to the place the sovereign once occupied, i. e., that of possessing practically nothing more than veto power, while the Commons may overrule the veto at will. It ill becomes the Liberals to oppose the referendum principle. If they plead for the rule of the people they can fear nothing in allowing that same people to vote directly upon the very issues they are asked to consider when they elect a Parliament. To one across the sea, it looks as if Mr. Asquith would have done well by immediately accepting the challenge and advocating the referendum as a means of discovering the popular will on all great issues.

Where Diaz Has Failed

The turmoil in Mexico serves to enforce the observations made recently upon the failure of Diaz. In the days when the press reeled off miles of praise for the "Captains of Industry" it was the fashion to call Diaz the greatest of living men. It was the same worship of material success without scrutiny of the methods by which it was gained. Today as we ask "Where did you get it, gentlemen?" many a hero is proved a financial buccaneer, and Diaz is shown to have "developed" wealth in Mexico without developing government or a people of intelligence. America has invested a billion dollars in that land, but Mexico has reaped only profits for the "classes," while the masses live on in sordid poverty and ignorance, and Diaz reigns rather than governs. His recent election illustrated how impossible it is for him to be defeated. Any one arising as a candidate is imprisoned, as Madero was, for daring to propose an opposition. Reyes went abroad some time ago because he had been guilty of being mentioned as a possible opponent to the old dictator and he remains in exile. Those who but glance at the surface of things repudiate their own republicanism by declaring that it is better for a people in that stage of civilization and forget to note that so long as it remains so they will never be in any other state of civilization. Diaz has developed a wealthy class through the use of American capital but he has failed to develop a citizenship out of Mexico's masses. His is a land where wealth accumulates and men decay. He is surrounded by a cabal of officials who have enriched themselves enormously by the granting of American and English privileges in investment and the Americans who have crossed the border despise the Mexican. Their investments do not add to his plenty nor their presence to his self-respect. This does not say their presence nor their money is not needed, but it does say that when money is put before men, men will count for less than money. Diaz has failed to create a citizenship.

Unto the Least of These

The Salvation Army people are now engaged in their annual crusade on behalf of Christmas cheer. General Booth began his work as an evangelist with a very atiquated theological message and a zealous type of Holy Spirit conversion. His zeal led him to the lowliest of men and there he found the true gospel of human helpfulness. He clung long to his evangelistic propaganda but the failure of his type of theology and the success of his kind of Christianity has made the Salvation Army a mighty organization for human heipfulness. No theology, narrow or broad, can destroy the success of a Christianity that, like its Master, goes about doing good. Last year the Army took cheer and the message of Christ to 350,000 people by means of a Christmas dinner. It gave temporary relief to 175,000 outside those provided for in its own homes, and gave away 160,000 meals besides. It gave outings to 40,000 mothers and children and found employment for 53,000 who were out of work. Besides these things it distributed 900,000 pounds of ice to the tenements in hot summer time, 5,000 tons of coal to the suffering in the winter, and gave away an untold number of garments. It restored missing friends, cared for destitute children, erring women and down-and-out men, in its homes. It visited the prisoner and found him work when he was released, nursed the poor victims of dread maladies when no one else would care for him, cared for the dirty drunkard when others would turn him over to the police and in all did just what Jesus told his neighbors at Nazareth that he had come to do. It took the Good News of a personal friend and savior to multitudes that none other would go to and thus filled full the Master's commission to this world by preaching the gospel to the poor. Let their theology and their methods be criticised as they may, no criticism of them could be more telling than that which their charity brings upon the churches by the vividness of the contrast it brings to that which they show.

Temperance Notes

In these days of conservation and prevention, why not prevent the making of paupers and criminals by abolishing the saloon? Why not save 100,000 premature graves every year by depriving liquor of its terrible toll? Why not conserve human life by conferring it upon the 10,000 infants that will be smothered by drunken parents before the next year is gone?

If the breweries were put out of business, 38,800 workingmen would be turned over to legitimate manufacturing and the millions they use to destroy prosperity would be contributed to build it up.

Editorial Table Talk

A species of dishonesty in our church life is occasionally turned up by the missionary secretaries in the case of the church treasurer's use of the funds contributed to specific missionary causes for the current expenses of the congregation. We are not over-plain in calling this dishonesty, albeit the officials may not be fully aware that it is such. When a congregation makes an offering to a missionary cause—foreign, American, state or any other—that money should be held absolutely sacred to that purpose. It is a good habit for treasurers to forward such funds immediately to the proper headquarters. The societies are constantly in need of every dollar that is coming to them, and, besides, it should be instantly removed from the temptation to apply it on the janitor's wage or the coal bill.

It is not the custom of The Christian Century to publish the appreciative words expressed by our readers. As a rule they are meant for the editors' aid and encouragement, and they never fail to help. This week, however, we are printing a few of the hearty commendations of the Daily Altar, which with one more issue rounds out a full year in which a theme, a scripture selection, a bit of poetry and a prayer have been provided for family and private devotion for every one of the three hundred and sixty-five days. This work has been a work of love by Professor Willett, the writer of the page, and has, perhaps, sprung from a more interior and intimate place in his heart than any of his previous writings. The wholesomeness and reality of such fellowship with God as is expressed in these prayers and selections of literature make The Daily Altar at once a guide and a standard of the life of the spirit. It greatly rejoices the editors to receive the appreciative words from our readers which reveal the impressive fact that through the year a large company of us have been kneeling together as families or in our closets meditating on the same great theme and offering the same simple prayer. We can print but a few of the good words sent us, but sufficient to assure other devout hearts that they belong to a large fellowship of those who aspire for the eternal values of the spirit. In this connection it will be grateful news to many to announce that the department will be continued at least until the Daily Altar is published in book form.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ of America has gradually enlarged its work during the past year to meet the growing opportunities for coöperation among the different churches. The field force has been considerably increased. Dr. E. B. Sanford, the Corresponding Secretary, has called to his assistance four other valuable men. Rev. Hugh B. MacCauley, of Trenton, New Jersey, has become the Secretary of the Eastern District of the Council. Rev. Charles E. Bacon has been made Secretary of the Central District, including nine states, with headquarters in Chicago. Rev. John P. Thomas, Jr., is secretary of the Western District, with his headquarters in Denver. And Rev. G. Frederick Wells has been chosen assistant in the research work of the national office at New York. Notable service has been rendered during the past year by the Commission on the Church and Social Service, which has investigated the labor conditions in the mining and coal districts of Pennsylvania, and has issued a very important report under the direction of its secretary, Rev. Charles Stelzle. An equally important work has been done by the Committee on Home Missions. It has secured the adoption of a plan of comity that is strengthening the nation-wide mission work of the churches affiliated in the Federal Council. It is probable that the next inter-church conference under the direction of the Federal Council of Churches will be held in Chicago in 1912. The Council is composed of four hundred officially appointed representatives, from thirty-two denominations, with a hundred thousand ministers and sixteen million members.

A letter from Rev. Albert J. Saunders, our Australian contributor, whose recent articles have been much appreciated by Christian Century readers, tells about the hearty reception accorded Secretary F. M. Rains by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ at Adelaide. Mr. Rains brought with him a letter from the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, suggesting the desirability of closer coöperation between the united work of American and Australian missions. The secretary's addresses made a deep impression upon Australian Disciples everywhere. "Commencing at Brisbane and finishing at Perth, he has lighted a torch half way around the Australian land which shall never be extinguished." "Three men of God," continues Mr. Saunders, "have left an abiding impression on the Australian mind in connection with missions. They are G. L. Wharton, A. McLean and F. M. Rains." Mr. Saunders describes with enthusiasm the evident progress being made by the Disciples of his country. Great interest is now being manifested in educational work. "We are all fast coming to see that the great work of the church today is educational and inspirational. Informing papers, addresses and discussions were given (at the Federal Council) on such topics as: Kindergarten work, the graded system, Sunday-school equipment, adult classes, and teacher training." The college of the Bible at Melbourne now has a student body of fifty, with three professors. Australia looks to America with a deal of pride as she sees her sons, Mark Collis, Cecil J. Armstrong, Hugh McLellan, J. C. Dickson, C. A. Moore, E. T. Edmunds, and others—standing in the front line of efficiency and leadership in our American church life.

The Passing of Mrs. Eddy

There was no surprise for the public in the announcement last week that Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy had passed away. In fact not a few people have believed that her death actually occured some years ago, but was being skilfully concealed from the faithful in order to prevent a collapse of the faith.

But the personality of Mrs. Eddy was so little in evidence during the last years of her life that it was a matter of little moment whether she were living or dead. And it speaks well for the strength of the organization she built up that her removal from actual leadership through a long period of years has been so little significant. It is probable that her death will work no change in the general affairs of the Christian Science community.

It is of course quite too early to estimate with any accuracy the place that Mrs. Eddy will hold in the company of religious leaders. The extraordinary success she achieved in building up a large and influential following has been one of the phenomena of modern church affairs. The permanency of the movement will not be affected by the passing of this woman who though so greatly revered and so freely quoted, was so little its leader for the last ten years. But there are other forces that are shaping its career much more potently than her life.

It is clear that its first ardent claims made for Christian Science, as capable of eliminating all disease and suffering from human life, have been abandoned by the wiser leaders of the organization. Some time ago it was decided that surgical operations would be advisable in many instances. And today the number of such operations performed upon Christian Scientists is very large. The evidence for this statement is easily obtainable by any who are interested in the inquiry.

Futher, the indifference to public opinion regarding the danger from contagious diseases has been modified by the gradual recognition of the rights of the community to self-protection in cases of epidemic. It was also a significant fact that in connection with Mrs. Eddy's death the statement was made, not by some hostile medical examiner, but by her own intimate friends and family, that the death resulted from pneumonia developed from a severe cold.

With such modifications, the first claims of Christian Science to be a panacea are gradually being reduced to the proportion of the various other organizations and beliefs that emphasize the power of the mind to limit and control physical disorder. On this ground Christian Science is perfectly safe, and there is no reason why it should not make a permanent and valuable contribution to Christian teachings. Furthermore, it has introduced new elements of taste into church architecture for which the entire church ought to be grateful.

Of course its weakest point is its philosophy of disease, or rather lack of philosophy. Second only to this is its misuse of Scripture through its entirely uncritical and unscientific doctrine of a level Bible, all of whose parts are equally valuable provided they can be made to teach the principles of the cult. Its mixture of eighteenth century metaphysics and East Indian speculation make it impossible as a serious belief among people of reflection.

In fact, its appeal is not to that class, but rather to those who are either well-to-do and out of touch with the usual forms of Christian activity, or those who, by reason of physical trouble, take up the ideas of Christian Science in the hope of finding relief. The best commendation of the system is the fact that it does genuinely help so many people, either by disengaging their thought from themselves, or by proving to them what is frequently true, namely that there is nothing really wrong with them after all.

Meanwhile it should be said with emphasis that Mrs. Eddy's life has been a benediction to great numbers of people, and her teachings, however partial and fragmentary their value as an interpretation either of Scripture or of the facts of life, have proved valuable to many in the community. The fact that this movement does not promise to be permanent need have nothing to do with the cordial recognition of all its virtues. It will at least have made a sincere effort to emphasize some neglected elements in the Christian faith. Time will prove the value of these, and also the transient character of the movement as a whole.

Baptism, Salvation and Church Membership

My dear Mr. Morrison: I was much interested in your favor of May 4, and have kept it by me for reference. I note you favor the practice of receiving members into Disciple churches who have not been immersed.

Now I have before me a quotation from "The Christian Leader and The Way" which says "Baptism is one of the conditions of salvation that alien sinners must comply with in order to salvation from past sins." Would you agree with this? and if so, would not the admission of unbaptized persons to a Disciple church be equivalent to admitting an unsaved person? I know that but few Disciples hold that baptism is essential to salvation, but I supposed all held that it is, when possible, essential to obedience to Christ, and I have liked this feature of your views. Such expressions as the above are thrown in the way of the movement toward union between the Baptists and Disciples. Can you give me any points that will enable me to meet such quotations from Disciple papers and preachers?

Cordially yours,

Boston. E. F. MERRIAM.

We have asked the editor of the Watchman, to allow us to respond through the columns of The Christian Century to his inquiry printed above. The quotation from "The Christian Leader and The Way" is going the rounds of Baptist papers to the prejudice of the union sentiment so fast growing up between the two bodies.

It should be said very plainly that the excellent paper from which the quotation is made does not represent that portion of the Disciples which is taking an interest in union with the Baptists.

As should be by this time well known, there are in reality two bodies of Disciples or Churches of Christ in this country. One numbers a million and a quarter, the other perhaps 150,000. The larger body is organized for missionary co-operation, has settled pastors, uses instrumental music in its worship. The smaller body declines to engage in missionary co-operation, has no settled pastors with salaries, and is opposed to the organ in its worship. To the smaller body the "Leader and Way" belongs. And while its spirit is most commendable in many ways, and its managing editor Mr. Fred Rowe is a Christian gentleman of the finest grain, it is not taken nor does it take itself to represent the views characteristic of the larger body.

Coming to the question, however, The Christian Century is not advocating receiving into the church by certificate any person who is not already a Christian, already pardoned of his past sins, already saved. Furthermore this paper is not advocating receiving by certifcate any person who is not already a member of the church of Christ. The Christian Century is not advocating receiving any person into the church at all—only Christ receives people into the church. What The Christian Century is protesting against is the sectarian practice of refusing fellowship in the church to those whom Christ has received into his fellowship and who are already members of his church.

We leave to those who care for such questions the discussion of the point whether salvation is before baptism or after baptism. The distinction between baptism as a condition of salvation and a command of Christ is, to us, too fine to grasp. To us, a man is as good as not saved if, being saved, he refuses to obey what to him is the clear command of Christ to be baptized.

It seems clear from Scripture and psychology, as well as common observation, that membership in the church, if not an absolute condition of salvation, is so nearly such as to justify the Disciple practice of having converts join the church before they do too much rejoicing over their salvation. This close coupling up of the initiating act of church membership with the soul-process of faith and repentance—while capable of crude misuse—is nevertheless a strong advantage in the Disciples evangelism.

The Christian Century does not advocate for a moment the admission of an unsaved person into the church, nor an unbaptized person; but in the most earnest manner we dispute the right of any group of Christians to deny any item of fellowship to any one whose membership in the church is sealed with Christ's own acceptance.

Is My Name Written There?

"Am I saved?" "Where shall I spend eternity?" "Is my name written there?" are questions of similar import and mean little or much, according to the character of the person asking them. One who thinks of salvation as escape from hell fire, of heaven as a place of selfish ease, of God as arbitrarily registering names in the book of fate, will not arouse the conscience by any or all of these questions. There is nothing moral in this idea of religion. The questions have moral significance when they are asked by one who abhors sin and seeks release from it, who thinks of heaven as the place of perfect justice, and of the book of God as containing the names of those whose love for man is genuine. The questions all amount to this for the earnest man: "Have I found my place in God's world, and am I filling it to the best of my ability?"

The disciples returned from a preaching tour and reported with delight that the spirits were subject to them. Jesus warned them against taking deeds out of the proper connection and treating them as ends in themselves. The subjection of spirits to the disciples got its meaning from the relation of the disciples to God. "Rejoice that your names are written in heaven." Power and skill must be devoted to the serious business of life if they are to bring satisfactory returns. The man who spends his leisure in training a dog does not rank with the man who uses his noon hour or evening in acquiring knowledge that makes him a better citizen or enables him to invent a machine that diminishes the drudgery of some worker. Accuracy in the use of a revolver is not a worthy accomplishment for the ordinary American citizen, for killing men is not our business. But it is worth while to know how to raise wheat and corn, for these crops are necessary to the life and health of the nation.

The evangelist announces that he has held a great meeting and gathered hundreds into the church. What would Jesus say to him? Would he not call attention to the bearing of the meeting upon the future power and influence of the church? Granted that you do have power to induce others to say they believe what you believe, the great question still remains: Are you helping people to be members of the spiritual democracy called the kingdom of God? In so far as the work of an evangelist brings men into this democracy, it is good. Jesus bids him rejoice in that service. The preacher invites the disciples everywhere to rejoice with him on the completion of a beautiful building in which he is to preach the gospel. The Master bids him consider the relation of the church to the poor and the outcasts, to the unevangelized at home and abroad, to the homes about it, to the politics of its town, and to the education of the young. The college does not get its name written in heaven by securing a large endowment, by the size of its student body, nor by the learning of its teachers. All these are good if they are employed for the purpose of preparing young men and young womn to fill worthily their places in life. Respectability is not synonymous with divine approval. The respectable man merely meets the requirements of the circle in which he moves. Among thieves the thief is respectable, among pirates the hard-hearted have honor, and in certain kinds of society the least serious are reckoned the most honorable.

The best disciples do not spend much of their time over the pages of the divine register. They are too busy with immediate duties. They have children to be kept clean physically and morally. They have sorrowing neighbors whom they must comfort. The Sunday-school is in need of them as teachers. Widows and orphans look to them for protection and guidance. Wayward boys and girls trust them and come to them for advice and encouragement. They are so busy doing good to others that no time is left for them to bother about their own salvation. The man who is always feeling his spiritual pulse is hopeless. It is necessary now and then for every one to take a look within and pass upon the motives of conduct. But the sanely religious give the greater part of their attention to the things to be done rather than to the feelings attending actions. They are aware that it is not easy to do the right thing "to the right person, to the right amount, at the right time, and in the right manner." They study their surroundings with a view to finding what they have to do in order to be co-workers with God.

Midweek Service, Dec. 21. Rev. 20:15; Luke 10:20.

"Think On These Things"

Chapman and Alexander in Chicago

A Meditation—Not a Verdict

BY GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Just now Chicago is divided into three classes as to the Chapman and Alexander meetings. First, tnere are those that regard them as in every way wonderful, wonderful in their spiritual power, wonderful in the messages they gave forth, wonderful in their organization, and wonderful in results. Second, there are those that are critically hostile, believing that the method is archaic and that the results in no way justified the efforts. Third, there are those who are sympathetically wondering and pondering upon the whole matter. With this last class I claim fellowship. We are the uncomfortable class. The others have the comfort of their own certainty. But our class is a very large one, so large that I sometimes fear to number myself with it. It is the class that wishes to preserve all that is true in the time-honored methods of evangelism, but equally anxious to fit the proclamation of the gospel message to the changing conditions of our present metropolitan life. The dogmatist of our day is he who goes far back or far forward. The rest of us—the eclectics in religion—must rest in our humility. My word, therefore, is a meditation, rather than the verdict of a partisan.

Not Pentecostal in Origin.

The Chapman meeting was not pentecostal in that it apparently did not come suddenly from heaven. It in no way had the spontaneity of the Welsh revival or of the great revivals of history. It was organized for. A few well-to-do laymen were responsible for its coming to Chicago. The ministry as a whole was indifferent. They remembered other efforts of like kind. They remembered, too, that Chapman had been here before. When the campaign became assured, most ministers gave their support, but some doubted.

Mr. Chapman and his party, consequently, did not come to a city or to a protestantism that was surcharged with expectancy and enthusiasm. The people in the churches did not create the revival. It was brought to them.

Revival Secret in the Church Itself.

Cards for prayer pledges and circles prepared by the leaders, were freely circulated; but they did not materially change the atmosphere. There is a widening conviction that the secret of revivals that strike down to the roots of life and that build lastingly is to be found with the church members themselves.

Mr. Chapman spoke to vast audiences at each of the three centers. They ran from 2,800 to 5,000. These, in themselves, were inspiring. The choruses led by Mr. Alexander were splendidly organized. The soloist, Mr. Naftsger, the pianist, Mr. Harkness, the chief of personal workers, Mr. Norton, Mrs. Alexander and Mrs. Norton were all in their chosen fields superior. Mr. Chapman is an adept as a platform manager. He is quiet, dignified, but every moment he grips the situation. There is no missing cog in the wheel of the organization.

Organization's Work Smooth.

Everything is planned and then carried out as planned. The art of it is striking. Sometimes one feels that something unexpected or spontaneous would be refreshing. There is no clashing of the leaders. They seemed always to be warm friends whose hearts were in their work. The organization, together with the capable and pleasing personalities of Mr. Chapman and his party, doubtless in large measure accounted for the large audiences.

But, besides, there was religion. Nothing but a religious message draws large audiences night after night. Religion is about all there is to life, anyway. The platform sermon is often overestimated. Mr. Chapman did not preach great sermons. He did not try. Perhaps he is a discerning psychologist. Perhaps he simply tries to give the great preachers a chance at the souls of his hearers. These are mystery of life, conscience, ideals, the Word, Christ, God—and may I say sin, or at least its consequences. The thing that counts in a meeting is not what the pulpit is saying to the souls in front of it; but what these souls are saying to themselves. As for myself, I was not a very good listener to the sermons, but the atmosphere preached to me till I preached to myself. The sermon that convicts may be a deed, almost forgotten, but brought up to trouble the conscience in the atmosphere created by the varied elements that go to make up a revival.

Object of Revival to Revive.

Indeed, what is the object of a revival if it is not to revive? It is inspiring to see drooping souls lift up their heads with courage, resolution and cheer. Many of my Christian friends faint by the way. The up-climb is too steep, or the fog dispiriting, or the waters too poisonous. They faint constantly about me. My benediction upon any revival that lifts their drooping heads as the falling rains lift up the withering grain.

To see a friend come to feel that he is a man again is a wonderful experience. I have seen several, and in the revival just closed.

There were some surprises to me in this meeting. Quite a number of people whom I know well, and living within a stone's throw of the Austin tabernacle, did not enter the meeting once. Some of these were hostile to revivals. They were intellectualists who believe in going up gradually. Of course they have observed widely enough to know that often great decisions are made in a moment, which decisions entirely change life. However, they think revivals are too emotional and will have nothing to do with them. Then there were others that did not go because they disliked the exhortation. They did not like to be embarrassed.

Much Voting—Not Always Clear.

Mr. Chapman does much voting. Sometimes I thought he was confusing and that the much voting did not work toward definiteness. In his men's meeting he was more clear and definite.

When the average non-church man saw the tabernacle being erected, I wonder if the following does not represent his mind:

Non-Member—What is that large building that is being erected?

Member—That is the tabernacle where Chapman and Alexander are to hold the great revival.

Non-Member—My, it's big, isn't it? How many will it seat?

Member—5,000, they say.

Non-Member—What is it costing?

Member—I understand about $5,000.

Non-Member—How long is it to be used?

Member—Two weeks.

Non-Member—Is that all? My, that is an awful lot of money just for two weeks. What's the matter with the churches? Can't they do the work?

Member—This is an effort especially to convert sinners.

Non-Member—Well, I should think we have enough preachers right here.

He and "member" part, but he keeps in mind that the object of the meeting is to convert him. He therefore stays away. The advertised object accordingly defeats itself. The officials of the Layman's Council estimate that over 90 per cent of all audiences were church members. The percentage of non-members attending might be as low as 5 per cent. The failure to get outsiders to attend is going to greatly lessen revival efforts in cities. The meeting of largest results that I attended was the children's night, but I should like to see the children make the public confession of their faith in the edifices where they are accustomed to meet. The association would mean more. Children are natural, but our ways with them, especially in religion, are often very unnatural.

Churches Not Built Around Ideas.

Mark Rutherford says in these days we do not build our churches around great ideas. We are not Calvinists, Arminians, or anything in particular. The truth of this was well illustrated in our group meeting.

W. R. Lane, of England, was our preacher. He is a thoroughgoing Calvinist. Two or three nights he valiantly set forth the Calvinistic doctrine. Several of my ministerial brethren were quite restless. But Lane has the health of humor and the saving humanity of a big heart. The Methodists of Chicago, not being trained in polemics as their fathers were, thought it the best preaching they ever heard. Alas for the wars of the past! I thought our people would be shocked, particularly at one sermon. But they liked it fine. After all, perhaps, it is the preacher and the truth that is in him that the people hear rather than the system of theology that he expounds.

A Calvinist Leader.

Mr. Lane was a splendid Christian gentleman, but I cannot understand how one can hold to the determining decrees of God and still exhort. It is well that men are kinder than their creeds. The soul is usually more elastic and hospitable than the mind.

Fifty thousand garment workers of Chicago were out on a strike during the latter part of the campaign. Winter is upon them and they are face to face with suffering. The federation of labor came to the rescue by taxing their members 25 cents a piece per week to support these fellow-workers. Here is a vast humanitarian work. The strike is a real problem of life. Jesus said "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me.."

I thought the message of Dr. Chapman lacked the social note, that of brotherhood, that of the kingdom. The man Jesus, who toiled and suffered, gave place entirely to the Christ of legal authority.

The Christ of Legal Authority.

"Believe in Jesus and thou shalt be saved" was the message. Jesus paid the whole debt on Calvary. We have our sins and if we believe on him we shall be clothed in his righteousness. Sin is infinite because it is against God and his government. Salvation is safety from the wrath of God, through the blood of Jesus, in the next world. Mr. Chapman did not strike as militant a note as I would have had him. I would have belief in Jesus mean without the least doubt living

Our Readers' Opinions

Sentiments of the Secretaries

[The crowded condition of our columns of late weeks has compelled us to postpone until now the publication of the opinions of the state secretaries concerning Secretary J. Fred Jones' proposal to practice Christion union in the smaller villages. The editors will be glad to have the opinions of other readers for publication in later issues.]

FROM THE MICHIGAN SECRETARY.

Editors Christian Century: I heartily endorse Brother Jones' article. He has stated the truth well. We are qualified to take the initiative and we should do it carefully, clearly and efficiently.

Grand Rapids, Mich. F. P. ARTHUR.

FROM MISSOURI'S SECRETARY.

My dear Bro. Willett: I have carefully read Bro. Jones' article on the "Village Church." I most heartily agree that the successful presentation of this plan would be the most speedy realization of "our plea" and beyond the question of doubt, the solution of the church problem in all our smaller towns.

I am not so hopeful that such a messenger would find a welcome in these villages. The first and strongest opposition will come from the pastors in these fields. It is my experience that a man has large room for development of sectarianism where he has a small field for all the desirable fruits of Christianity.

I should be most happy to make the effort. I am persuaded that the need and not the difficulty should determine our work. Most sincerely yours,

Kansas City. D. Y. DONALDSON.

FROM THE KANSAS SECRETARY.

Dear Brother Willett: Your editorial on "A Practical Campaign for Unity" suggested by a question presented by J. Fred Jones of Illinois to hand. I think such a plan as you propose, if promoted by the right kind of a man, in over-churched towns, where the fundamentals of the gospel are not clearly preached would in every instance be productive of much good, even though in only a few instances it would result in practical Christian unity. The man for such a work would have to be spiritual and cultured and patient and content to preach a few things and not try to display his knowledge about many things that may be found in the realm of opinion. The work outlined would certainly be very interesting. Fraternally,

Topeka, Kan. GEO. E. LYON.

FROM IOWA'S SECRETARY.

Dear Brother Willett: I have read the letter of Brother Jones very carefully and voice my hearty approval of the suggestions made. Denominationalism is not dead, its baneful influence is to be seen, especially in our smaler towns; bringing the question of Christian unity to the front as never before. Men and women of every faith and no faith, recognize the evil of division among Christian people and, as never before will welcome a solution to the problem.

It may be that we are trying to hurry God's plan, that we are impatient and expect too much. The leaven of Christian unity is at work. The leaven may be hidden, but I believe that it is there and doing its work and, in God's own good time the whole lump will be leavened.

It occurs to me that we should work along two lines. The one suggested by Brotner Jones, in which ministers of tact and ability should present the Bible plea for Christian unity in small towns and villages in which the Christian people are divided and endeavoring to support a number of denominational churches, so many that the spirit of rivalry fairly crushes out the Spirit of Christ, so many that it requires the time of the ministers and their people to save the church and support the minister, with no time to care for the sick, minister to the poor and save the unconverted. This could be done with first, a conference of the ministers of the town; second, a conference with the business men, professional men, and other leading men of the town; third, a public appeal to the citizens of the community. Such an effort might only result in the seed sowing that would bear no immediate fruits or, it might results in the formation of a "unity council" that would stand for the preaching of an affirmative plea emphasizing the things fundamental.

The second line of procedure could be a propaganda of education in which the fundamentals should be wrought out and placed in the hands of every denominational minister and ask him to carefully study them and teach them to his people in his own way, leaving it to the good judgment of the people and to God to work out the results.

I would rejoice to see such a man put at this kind of work in each of our states. I would not be so much concerned about organizing churches, but rather be concerned about presenting the New Testament plea and giving emphasis to the fundamentals of faith, the things on which the Christian world can unite without a sacrifice of principle.

We have just had an interesting experience in Iowa. A small town of four hundred people and three church buildings, a Congregationalist, Methodist Episcopal and a Christian. Neither of the congregations was able to support a minister alone and they agreed to unite their efforts and employ one man to minister to the three congregations. First, they employed a Congregationalist minister and they got along very nicely. Second, they employed an M. E. minister and they got along quite well with his services. When his time expired the first of October of this year, it was our turn to furnish the preacher. The M. E. minister, however, was continued there by the conference and it was to be one of their regular stations. Our brethren were thus left out of the merger and they had the choice of yielding the field or employing an evangelist with the hope of securing enough strength to employ a minister of their own. The meeting was held resulting in 55 people becoming obedient to the Gospel, many of them leading citizens of the town, and the employment of a minister. The town cannot support three ministers, nor two, and we wait to see the final outcome.

Des Moines, Iowa. B. S. DENNY.

FROM WISCONSIN'S SECRETARY.

Dear Brother Willett: I am favorably impressed with Bro. J. Fred Jones' suggestions and with your comments upon them. I note also with approval your reference to the "Christian Union Foundation." I have, since entering upon this work, been watching carefully and studying the union experiments in Wisconsin.

Results so far, I think, scarcely warrant an opinion. Of this, however, I feel sure: the very first thing needed is a vigorous campaign of education, and I think this can best be conducted by means of the press. It seems to me that this is more an age of the printed page than one of public gatherings. I am learning too that people will read what is being said on religious subjects if said in the proper way. This method too will be less conspicuous and while working in a quiet, subtle way, will avoid much prejudice and opposition, which are to be avoided as much as possible, and which would most surely be aroused if public meetings are attempted. We also have learned as Bro. Jones suggests, that the greatest drawback to any union movement is the opposition which comes from the leaders. One minister, who is sweating his soul over one of these union problems, told me but recently that the matter would be soon settled most satisfactorily to every one concerned if only "outsiders" would not interfere. When the masses have been given a broader, higher vision and thus lifted above the narrowness and some of the littlenesses that enter into our religious work, especially then do I believe that the methods comprising lecturships and special public campaigns can be successfully put into practice. I hail with delight the establishing of the Christian Union Foundation, believing it to be one of the most important movements of this stirring time. I lend myself without reserve to any feasible plan which looks toward the uniting of God's people, realizing more and more that there is but one plan which can ever succeed and that is the Divine plan.

I take it that you wish brief comment and have tried to follow that principle. May the good Father bless you in your work and give you strength for your labors in every effort looking toward the extension of the kingdom of our Master. FRANK L. VAN VOORHIS.

Green Bay, Wis.

FROM THE KENTUCKY SECRETARY.

Editors Christian Century: (1) The evil of division is nowhere more apparent than in the village and country church, and Bro. J. Fred Jones does not over-state the case. Certainly the sin of division is nowhere so apparent and the awful waste of money in seeking to keep up from 3 to 6 churches in a village or small town must be accounted for.

(2) If the man can be found and the funds be provided to support him in the proposed effort to inaugurate such a campaign, it seems to me that it would be wise to undertake it.

(3) None of us could object to an effort at that kind of union. J. Fred Jones "was bred in old Kentucky," and hence we would not expect a suggestion from him that would not be safe and "sound."

(4) As far as a judgment can be formed from a knowledge of Kentucky, I would say that it will not avail very much—but there may be fields riper for this than this state. Possibly tried in some other section we might be led to see possibilities in that line here that are not now apparent.

(5) In the comments on this article by Bro. Jones is a statement that hardly does state secretaries and other workers justice. We feel justified in seeking to establish a church that is "Christian only" in any field—for the sake of this very principle that we hold so dear. Wherever there is such a field no matter how over-churched it is with denominationalism we feel that we have a divine call to tell the gospel of "Christian union" there. With best wishes, I am, fraternally,

Sulphur, Ky. H. W. ELLIOTT.

A FURTHER WORD FROM ILLINOIS SECRETARY.

Dear Bro. Willett: The place you give my suggestion in the Century is very kind, and besides it encourages me in the plan proposed.

Speaking for the Illinois Missionary Society, I would say if it was a good impulse for a year or two it might be put into practice if our income would justify it. But I do not know how to secure the impulse or the increased income. Our preachers, being human, for the most, seek the line of the least resistance and emphasize our missionary interests that are more popular. State missions being neither popular nor crowned with the emotional, get no proper and continuous representation in our pulpits and our income is at a standstill.

But, I am sure of the reasonableness of the suggestion, and from the little time I have had to test it on the ground I believe it will work. All kinds of Christian people are so tired of the desperate struggle to maintain churches in the villages that they give a most cordial hearing to a word for better conditions. Then, I find that it is a strong appeal to the strong men outside the village churches. Of course the village ministry squarely opposes any proposition that even squints at unity, but the body of the church people do not sympathize with them. The truth is the average village minister is of small caliber and he cannot therefore be blamed for his attitude, but the preacher who will make himself the intelligent and consecrated minister to the entire village has a wonderful field just now.

I am sorry to say that many of our own men are content to minister to the little company they have to begin with, and do not seem to feel a desire to enlarge their borders. The truth is we have many men and churches that are sectarian, that are trying to deal with the unity proposition. Of course their real position hinders them in the very things that they are set to accomplish.

We have so many projects going now, whose bases are brainstorms that it is hard to keep our minds and hearts upon the real purpose of our movement, but one could greatly wish that there was some one who could turn all this enthusiasm into the main channel and I hope the Century may do it.

It seems to me the project should have a thorough threshing out in our conventions and for some time to come as well as in our papers. Sincerely yours,

Bloomington, Ill. J. Fred Jones.

FROM OHIO SUNDAY SCHOOL SECRETARY.

I am appreciating the Christian Century more and more. I wish we had a man among us who was large enough to be a martyr to demonstrate the practical working of real Christian union as pleaded for by Thomas Campbell. We need a man large enough to be seen ,wise enough to be heard, true enough to be trusted, and courageous enough to be a sacrifice to prove that Christian union, by the co-operation of different denominations on equal and fraternal basis, is practical and workable. I have proved it myself by the actual organization of two such works during my ministry. Both worked well and produced the results for which we are actually pleading. At Cissna Park, Ill., I banded together twelve Disciples, ten Presbyterians, four Lutherans, two Methodists, two Quakers and seven who were not members of any church, into a union work. Out of twenty-three confessions over the space of three years, all but one were immersed. The Presbyterians furnished most of the Sunday-school teachers and the Quaker was superintendent of the Bible school. Now that is what I call church union in practice. But it is a small country village and I have never published it. But if such a work as that could be undertaken by a man like Peter Ainslie, or some such man in an honest endeavor to make it go, I believe it can succeed.

The Christian Century is on the right track on the subject, and if the union ever comes, it must come along the lines of accepting our neighbors where they are and leading them by the Bible only, to where it will lead—to the exalted Christ so we can all see Jesus only.

In my work as Bible evangelist I could tell you some most pitiable stories of wasted money and fields and forces in the vain and foolish efforts to maintain denominational sectarianism—and I am frank to say that I know no church today that can say truly it is not guilty of these sins. Many villages are growing restive under the present religious restraint and handicap that their divided state puts on them. But I must stop. I could write all night on this subject that wrings my heart as I go about the state and realize the pitiable condition of things that exist in the name of religion. No wonder many of the churches are almost deserted, and spiritual life dead. How can it be otherwise?

Please remember I just started to order some books and wanted to say a few words of praise and appreciation of your valuable paper. Your editorials are charming—they keep leading one toward the border line of the untried but not the untrue. They fire us with the romantic hope that our ideals are one day to be realized. If we just had the man that was big enough and dared to die (or really was worth killing) I believe the glorious day of Christian union could be realized and that soon. God meets men and reveals himself in the realm of the practical and not in theories. The Christian world will have to work and worship together before they can think together.

Springfield, O. L. I. Mercer.

Concerning the Daily Altar

Dear Bro. Morrison:—I have been intending to write you a letter and tell you what a help the Christian Century has been to me and how much I have enjoyed it. I still intend to write the letter and this postal is just to ask you to not discontinue "The Daily Altar" page. Helena M. Cotton.

Shelbyville, Ind.

Editors Christian Century:—Let me say just a word of appreciation of your editorial, "The Deeper Thankfulness," issue of Nov. 17. I thought it splendid, and made liberal use of it in my Thanksgiving sermon. We use the "Daily Altar." Think it helpful and beautiful. Hope it will be continued.

D. B. Titus,

Rupert, Idaho. Pastor.

Dear Dr. Willett:—You wish to know if we want the "Daily Altar" to be continued in the Christian Century. I for one say most certainly we do. I have enjoyed the paper for a long time, and especially that page. It is uplifting and strengthening each week, as we are shut in from the outside world in this mountain village. We are without a pastor and many young students stand in this old historic pulpit trying to teach the way of life. Give us the "Daily Altar." I would that the whole brotherhood could be induced to read and study the pages of the "Century."

Bethany, W. Va. Mrs. S. B. Dobyns.

Editors Christian Century:—By all means continue the "Daily Altar." I use it daily. You are giving us a mighty good paper. It is full of rich and good things. It is a great power for better things.

Vacaville, Cal. Frank E. Boren.

Editors Christian Century:—I want to be among those who ask for a continuation of "The Daily Altar." We have been using it at our morning family worship during the year, and have found it most helpful. I know of nothing in this line that seems to me quite so satisfactory.

And while I am at it, let me tell you how very much I am enjoying The Christian Century these days. I have had a sneaking feeling of ingratitude for pretty nearly a whole year because I have not written to let you know how helpful and inspiring I have found the Century. It always stimulates me, and I am glad to find it so religiously helpful. You seem to have discovered the secret of "speaking the truth in love." Every now and then I find some things about which I feel constrained to attempt the "suspended judgment" attitude, but I would greatly prefer a paper from which I differed in some things to one which pandered to me by saying what it thought I believed instead of saying what it believed! I enjoy the Century, and it helps me as a Christian and as a preacher. Fraternally, Graham Frank.

Liberty, Mo.

Dear Dr. Willett:—The "Daily Altar" page has been a great comfort and inspiration to me personally and has been greatly prized in our home. We have made it a practice to read it each morning at the family breakfast table. We hope it may be continued after Dec. 31. Claire L. Waite.

Milwaukee, Wis.

Editors Christian Century:—The Century for this week just to hand, and it seems to me better than any preceding issue. Personally I should be very sorry to see the "Daily Altar" discontined, at least before the publication of Dr. Willett's book containing what has already been given in that department. A. H. Seymour.

De Smet, S. D.

Editors Christian Century: "The Daily Altar" quite helpful and would like it continued. I wish you would publish a first-page exhaustive editorial review of Phillips' "Kingdom." Claris Yeuell.

Paulding, O.

Editors Christian Century: We have many times thought of writing you to express our apreciation of "The Daily Altar." It fills a place in your paper. that nothing else can fill. May the Christian Century continue "The Daily Altar page."

Elkhorn, Wis. H. C. Waite and Family.

You are giving us the best paper in The Christian Century the Disciples have ever had. You are telling our people the truth they must learn and practice if they fulfill their highest mission. A. N. Glover.

Fullerton, Cal.

Dear Bro. Morrison: Inclosed please find check for $1.60. This is money well spent. I consider "The Christian Century" the best religious periodical that comes to my desk. Its pages are fresh and inspiring. I hope to be able to place quite a few in the homes of my people. If I could get my entire membership to read "The Christian Century" I feel confident that they would have a larger vision of God and his kingdom.

H. G. Connelly, Minister.

Ardmore, Okla.

Editors Christian Century: Do not take from us the "Daily Altar" page. Many religious newspapers have little enough reading that can be called a help in the religious life of their readers. No matter what my mood, no matter what the particular burden of the day, I always find a message in these readings. Oftentimes it seems God-sent. M. H. S.

Church and College Closely Knit

How Valparaiso University Life and Church Life Interpenetrate in Mutual Service

BY H. D. WILLIAMS.

The Christian church at Valparaiso, Ind., is an institution worthy of study. The building, a large and commodious structure near the center of the city, is badly worn by service and is not especially fitted just now to the needs of a large church. Preparations are under way to expend $2,500 or more in improvements. The members, to the number of 1,200 live in all parts of this city of 10,000. They come from all classes, from the humblest poor to fat-salaried officials, from the uneducated to learned professors. This is no class church; rich and poor alike are welcomed and urged each to fraternize the other in a real way. The spirit of equality is very marked.

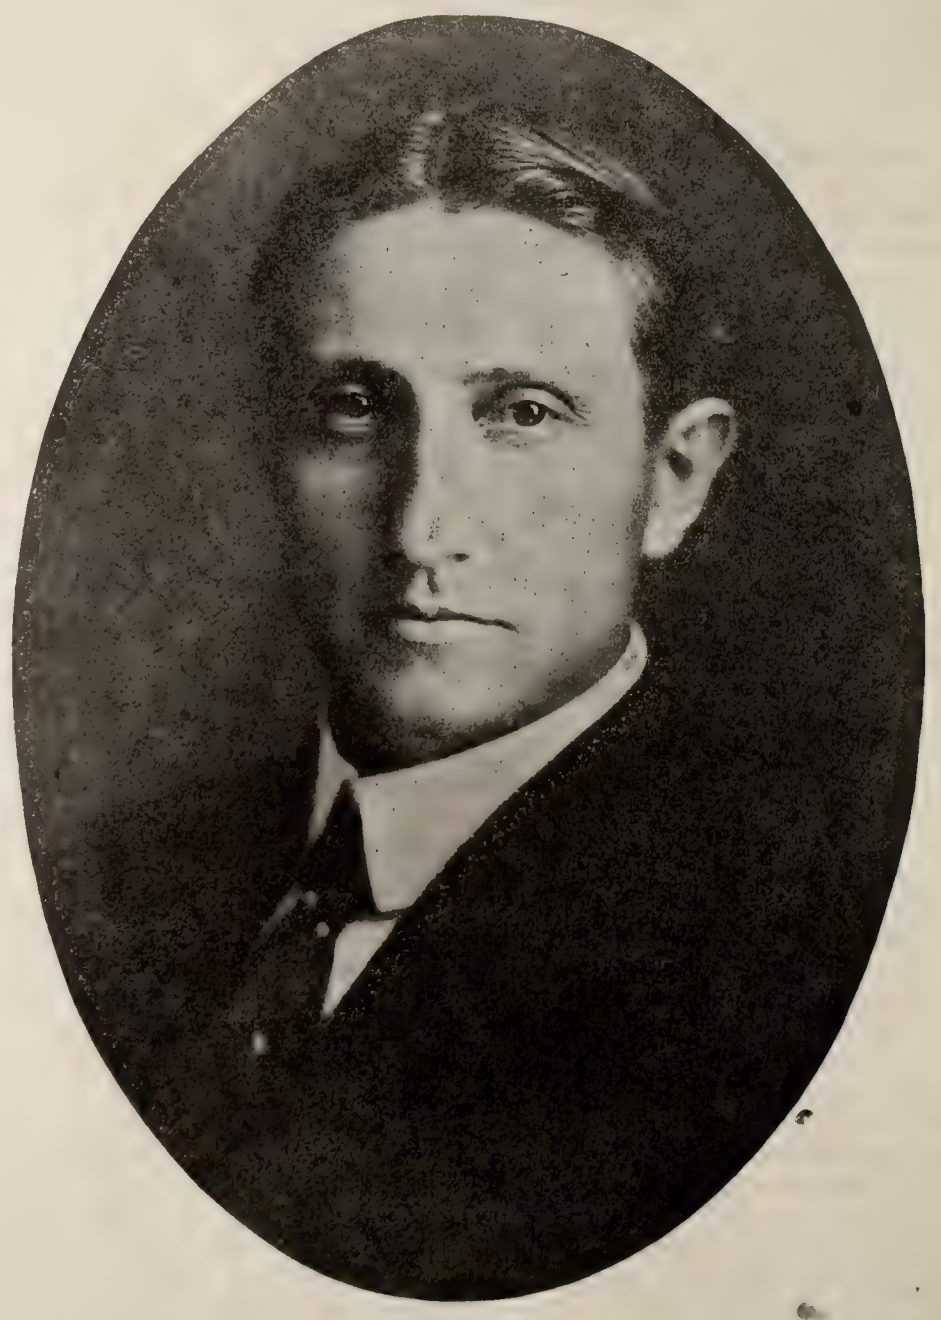
Strong Masculine Element in Church.

The church is blessed with a fine body of business and professional men. Among them are many who count but little in the service of the church. Then there are many who are worthy and helpful, and a few who deserve special mention for the good of other men who earnestly desire to be more efficient in Christian service. There is H. B. Brown, for instance, who is president of Valparaiso University. He is a very busy man; he looks after more students annually than any other university president in America, but he finds time to do many things in the church. He attends Sunday-school where he acts as an usher and teaches a class of boys of 14 and 15 years of age. He attends both the morning and the evening services of the church, and though 63 years of age, is one of the most regular and active members of the Endeavor Society. Does he give? Certainly, but his giving of time and service is his best gift, though he makes it a rule to pay one-tenth of the running expenses of this church.



The Church's Pre-eminent Teacher.

Then there is Prof. M. E. Bogarte, dean of the department of mathematics and engineering in the university. He is a great man, distinguished, brilliant and successful. He is a wheel-horse in the Valparaiso church. His special work is that of teacher for one of the greatest Sunday-school classes to be found in many states. It consists of over 300 people, chiefly men, though some women are in it. It meets in a separate room at the regular Sunday-school hour and has its own opening and closing exercises. Prof. Bogarte teaches by the lecture method in which he is a master. He proceeds as before a university class. He is deliberate, logical and intensely illuminating. He draws the big class and holds its deepest interest by a sensible, honest, frank, practical and scholarly exposition of Scripture. He is a thoroughly modern man with modern methods. He is no legalist or literalist. He is supremely loyal to Christ, duly prizing, at the same time, his Christian liberty. He uses no crowd catching devices. He teaches right on through the hard and prosy problems as they may come, relying upon the Bible to suggest the principles of vital importance and absorbing interest today. Of course his teaching is "driven home" and clinched by the power of a captivating personality that compels respect, admiration and even love from those who know him.

In addition to these two very extraordinary men, there are Prof. C. W. Benton, Doctor Young, Doctor Blount, Mr. Geo. Beach, Congressman Crumpacker, Tommy Shreve, and several others who are strong men and fine specimens of devotion to the church.

Women Numbered Among Leaders.

And the women, of course, are really ahead of the men. The writer attended a meeting of the ladies' organization which, in this church, is called "The King's Daughters." It is a body of fine women and they render valuable service to both church and community. Of these women, Mrs. Cora Benham, the Sunday-school superintendent, is one of the most active. She is professor of mathematics in the university, but finds time to superintend the school, attend teachers' meetings and in many ways aid her teachers. She is an enterprising and energetic superintendent who proposes to lift her school to the highest level. Under her hand the school is prospering, the attendance now running at about 500.

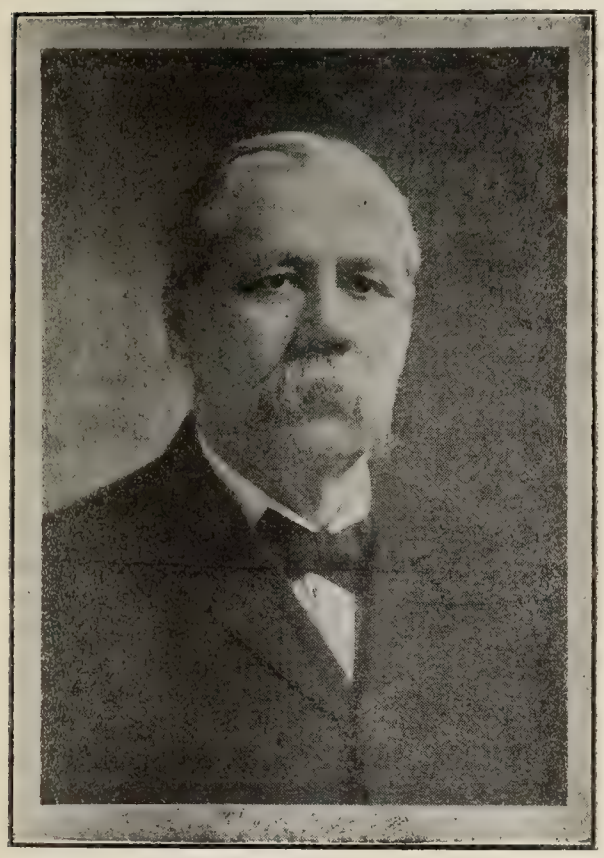
The minister who is so fortunate as to be thus associated is Claude E. Hill, National Superintendent of Christian Endeavor among the Disciples. He has been on the field a year and a half and is doing a good work. He succeeded Bruce Brown, now of Spokane, Washington. J. H. O. Smith, J. V. Updike and John L. Brandt were former ministers here. Hill is a great hustler. He is hard to overtake, for he walks like the wind. Not content with fast walking, he now owns an automobile in which he rushes about the city and all through the country at his will. And when pastoral work fails to satisfy his going spirit, he chases quail all over the country. He makes things move when he gets behind them. Yet Mr. Hill does not drive people; he leads them and he appears to lead very successfully.

Pastor Universally Regarded.

He is one of the men in whom everybody believes. All admit and admire his honesty and enthusiasm, even though they may differ from him in some things.



As a preacher, Mr. Hill is practical and ethical rather than theological. His sermons nearly always are directly applicable to the present problems and undertakings of the church or community. He deals ever with the big problems of the soul; he has no time for trivialities. In the first sermon heard by the writer his text was the incident of Jacob wrestling with the angel. He told the story in detail, giving the history that led up to it. Then he gave a thoroughly spiritual interpretation of it—that it is a picturesque statement of the better Jacob overcoming the baser Jacob—of Jacob's conscience successfully subduing Jacob's selfishness. Then he applied the lesson by saying that Jesus, the elder brother, approaches as did Esau, and sets every man today at the same struggle between his better self and his baser self.

At night his topic was, "What Valparaiso Needs." He laid down some general principles concerning city improvement, and then pointed out several city sins and charged them up to the neglect of Christian voters. He concluded with a ringing challenge for good men to join him in a campaign to purify and beautify Valparaiso. The following day the sermon was the talk of the town.

Militant, But Not a Fighter.

Mr. Hill, in his Sunday evening sermon was following the bent of his disposition. He likes a fight for the kingdom of God. He enjoys dealing hard knocks against evil. At the same time he is far from "a fighting preacher." He is a spiritual man, deeply devotional, and ever winning his people to the Christian graces. He is an unusual combination of the militant and the devotional, of the entertaining and the instructive. Crowds wait upon his ministry and the church grows constantly and regularly.

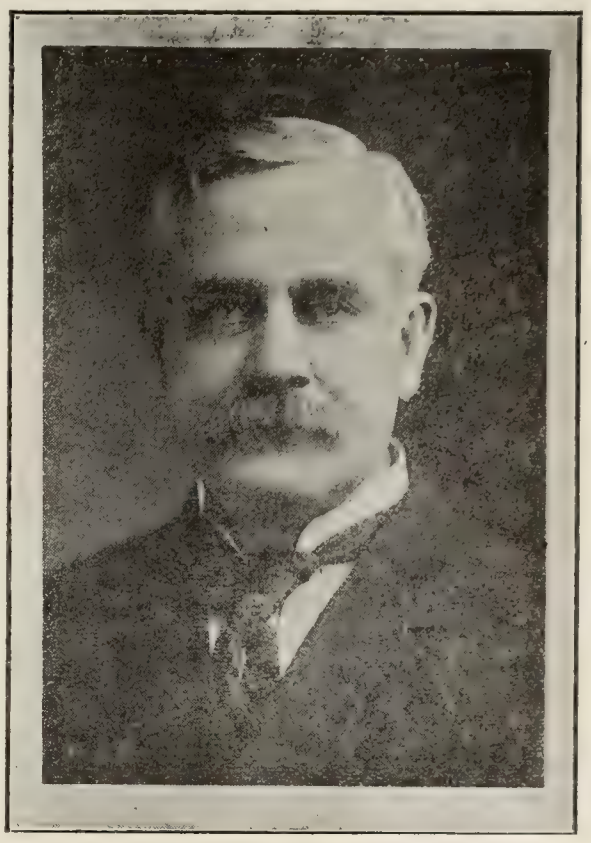
Mr. Hill is an Endeavor specialist and has one of the finest societies in Indiana. He is a lover of young people and has great power with them.



The Hospital.

There is a fine, well-equipped little hospital in Valparaiso, called "The Christian Hospital." It belongs to the National Benevolent Association and is presided over by Mrs. Nora Woodruff. It employs seven nurses and can care for twenty-five patients at once. It is well filled nearly all the time. It also maintains a training school for nurses. It is a fine place in which to be sick—no smoke and no roaring streets. It is also the ideal place to learn nursing, and the expenses are exceedingly low. Here in the fine country air and stillness and so near the best medical skill of the West, this little hospital should be crowded all the time.

The Great University.

This is the supreme thing in this little city. Among educational institutions, it is unique. In 1873, two men, H. B. Brown and O. P. Kinsey, came here and started a school for teachers. During the first year it had 35 students; during the last it enrolled 5,523.

The secret of this marvelous growth is not hard to discover when one is on the ground. Valparaiso puts its educational goods within the reach of every ambitious and industrious youth. It runs four large rooming and boarding houses where students can room and board at from $1.70 to $3 per week. Poor living, you say. But you are wrong. The rooms are good, neat and comfortable, while the food is well-cooked, substantial and abundant. Tht writer and his wife occupied a suite and took meals in Altruria Hall for six days. The price of the room, steam-heated, supplied with hot and cold water, well-furnished including two individual beds, is $1 per week and the board $2. A room of equal merit in any ordinary town would cost $3.50 or more. For a year of 48 weeks a student can pay tuition, board and room-rent for $122. Of the 5,523 students in attendance last year, 2,000 never could have gone to an institution of higher education had it not been for Valparaiso.

Professor M. E. Bogarte.

High Educational Character.

To mention this material aspect first, is not, however, to be taken as an indication that inexpensiveness in living is the main virtue of this institution. It is an educational plant of high character. A splendid faculty of 160 instructors guides the institution. President Brown regards the teacher as the essential thing in the university. He has a remarkable power of selecting teachers. And despite the fact that not a dollar of endowment lies under the school the teachers are well paid.

Some of the characteristics that impressed me are: The democracy of the life here, its practicability, the lack of those parasitic institutions, secret fraternities and over-done athletics, a firm but quiet discipline, the spirit of service and sacrifice, a genuine religious tone, and the close contact of teacher and students. President Brown is a genius in fathering the student body, looking after their moral as well as their intellectual welfare.

It is a great thing to lead a church as Mr. Hill does in a community of vigorous young life such as Valparaiso affords. The remembrance of our stay in church and school will abide with us always.

This, then, is man; a being who, if he will live the life that essentially and distinctively is man's, must use categories of thought and obey principles of conduct, which have their source beyond sense and their satisfaction beyond time. In other words, whether or not man actually is immortal, he is called on to live as if he were.—Carnegie Simpson.

Strength in Preaching

By O. A. Smith.

In many churches so much time is consumed in the preliminary exercises that the audience is tired before the pastor begins his sermon. We need to appreciate the fact that the age demands of its ministers and church workers, the same virtues that it demands of other workers. This age says to the business man, "Be prompt and quick in meeting the demands of the public if you would succeed." It says to the teacher, "Make your teaching clear and concise. Give our children the discipline that will enable them to grasp the affairs of life and dispatch their work." It says to the literary worker, "If you would make your story or poem available, be brief. Eliminate every superfluous word. Make your power greater by condensation. Don't play with words! Boil it down!"

If this is the message of the age to men and women in all departments of life, the preacher should be the last man who would disregard it by wading through labyrinths of words, even though it be in deference to a traditional custom.

Preacher Must Reach Intellect.

The service should be comprehensive in its appeal to the intellect. This is especially true of the part which is designed to solve the old problem of reaching men. There must be something to satisfy the intellectual nature. Not every preacher can teach, in the sense of unfolding new truths to his hearers. But every preacher should be able to present some thought that will touch the human experience of his listeners, leading them into a larger conception of spiritual truth. For the pastor who is ever longing, searching for the most vital personal message, perhaps no exercise can be better than the following. Let him select the man of the keenest, most judicial intellect in his audience. Let him follow the suggestions which come to him as he endeavors to meet the unspoken thoughts of that man. Let him think, "What can I give of my deepest spiritual life, which will commend itself to that mind as worthy of retention, of a moment's consideration? How can I suggest to him a train of thought which will make the Christ ideal of life seem rational and vital?"

Sensitive to Other People's Needs.

In this connection, we may note the fact that the most powerful teachers of spiritual truth, are men who have a decided sixth sense in regard to the personal needs of every individual they meet; the men who feel so strongly the mental and spiritual conditions of others that they instinctively proceed to meet those needs. That ability is the result of a sensitive condition of soul. The pastor who cultivates that power by heart-to-heart mingling with men and the silent communion of his own soul with the Soul which is the source of all love and truth, cannot fail to develop spiritually; cannot fail to grow in his power of reaching men through the public service of which he is the leader.

It is unfair to the American public to say that it demands of its pulpits mere entertainment. It does not, for any length of time, encourage the performances of religious freaks, or give its support to the spectacular. But we must admit that it does assume toward the minister the same attitude that it assumes toward other workers. It says directly, as it says through the editor, to the man who would write for its press: "If you would hold my attention for an hour, you must give me something adequate in return for it. You, as much as I, are a paid worker in this community. You must have something worth saying, and you must say it well."

The Book World

RAMBLES IN SPAIN, by John D. Fitz-Gerald. A generation ago, when a European tour made the fortunate traveler really quite distingue, Spain was clearly away from the beaten track and only occasionally visited by American tourists. As yet, the tribes of "personally conducted" wayfarers have not swarmed over its borders, with linen dusters fairly snapping in their forced march under the watchful espionage of a courier, and though "sheep without a shepherd" may have a touching sound, infinitely more pathetic are the harassed countenances of those travelers who are "seeing Europe in forty-seven days" under the relentless "shepherding" of a travel bureau's representive. Spain has become, therefore, one of the most delightful countries to explore, not having been exploited. No more interesting book of travel has been published in recent years than Mr. Fitz-Gerald's story of his leisurely rambles through the land of the picturesque Spaniard, covering more than two years. The book is made up from letters written by the author and is in delightful personal style, so that those who travel through the medium of books will find not only a fund of information, but much local color, so that the experiences seem quite one's own. A chapter on "The Country and Its People" makes it interesting from a political standpoint. The book is profusely illustrated by photographs, many taken by Mr. Fitz-Gerald. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Company. Pp. 290. $3 net).

EDUCATION IN SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE, by Dr. A. J. Zenner. The question of education in social purity is one that has been growing in importance in the thought of all open minded parents and educators during the past few years. The question is asked with increasing insistency, "How can children be taught the elements of sexual purity and the dangers of indulgence in sin without running the risk of doing more harm than good? It is the conviction of not a few that many of the books which are written with the purest purpose and the sincerest effort to do good have actually resulted in harm when put into the hands of immature children, even those for whom they were obviously intended. Sexual education can only come from a mature mind by actual conversation with the child. The aids that are so freely provided at present for the sexual education of children should come to the children not directly, but through the medium of parents and teachers who first make themselves acquainted with the theme and then speak as only trusted friends can speak to the children. In this little volume Dr. Zenner of the Medical Department of the University of Cincinnati, has included several talks which he gave to the children of his city both in the school room and in social groups. Such talks are of great value, and the book is one that might well be studied by parents and teachers in the prepaartion for the teaching of these absolutely fundamental truths regarding hygiene, habit, alcohol, the origin of life, prevention of social disease, and the dangers of impurity. Two valuable chapters are added on the method of teaching. (The Robert Clark Co., Cincinnati, 1910, pp. 126, $1.00 net).

YEAR BOOK OF THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE, by Ernest H. Cherrington. Another year's temperance elections have come and gone and the Anti-Saloon League has registered its usual quota of victories. Now is a good time to begin to stock the arsenal for the next battle and there is no better source of supply than in this volume of facts and data of progress. Mr. Cherrington has succeeded in compressing an encyclopedic array of facts into his book, especially those facts which vouch for the success of the temperance movement. Facts, maps, tables, diagrams and meaty paragraphs all enter into its composition. And they are heartening to the temperance worker who relies upon persistent effort and is willing to fight anywhere at any time if only he can strike a blow at the saloon. If one thinks it a good thing to put saloons out of business without regard to whether it was done by towns, counties or states, this book will tell him how much he has to rejoice over. If he is willing to put them out of business one at a time or by the thousands at a stroke, he may learn how both have been done. He will see portrayed the progress made—an amazing progress—and get a vision of what is coming. Every pastor and editor should have this book and so should all who are anxious to say a word for the cause. (Westerville, O. Anti-Saloon League of America. Pp. 256. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.)

SUNDAY EVENING, by Sir William Robertson Nicoll. This is a volume containing "fifty-two short sermons for home reading." Mr. Nicoll is the well known editor of the British Weekly. Perhaps few men of to-day have a larger acquaintance with books. He is also an orthodox Christian and ever ready to fight for his orthodoxy. Besides, he has the deep mystic strain, common to most Celts. Thus he brings to his sermons literary freshness of treatment and illustration, strength of conviction and depth of feeling. There are not in this country many laymen who buy volumes of sermons. It would be better for our Christianity and our homes if there were. Any home would be enriched by the daily reading of this volume around the fireside. (London: Hodder & Stoughton. Pp. 416. $1.50, net.)

A WILDERNESS DOG, by Clarence Hawkes. From the ravenous creature that hovered on the outskirts of camp fires and the lessening fear of man when he had partaken of some of the scraps thrown away by the woodsman, is traced the history of the trustful dog that has come to us from the pack of the gray wolf. The taming of Hairface by Roderick McElwain, a lumberman, and his transformation to the man's protector instead of his enemy is a realistic story of the devotion of his kind. (Philadelphia: George W. Jacobs and Company. Pp. 287. $1.50).

RANGE AND TRAIL, by Edwin L. Sabin. Young readers of "Bar B Boys" will want this continuation of the interesting happenings in that book. Mr. Sabin's stories are clean and set high ideals of true courage for his readers. A growing boy demands books where there is action and the spice of adventure, and these books supply that without the lawless element of the usual "Wild West" brand. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Company. Pp. 445. $1.50).

Rainier of the Last Frontier

Presently a soldier was at the door rattling a key and an instant later a Filipino impassive and diminutive, was bringing in a bucket of water and a basin.

"Wash up," said the soldier. "And git your side partner ready for breakfast." A bugle rang out the call as he spoke.

With mingled tenderness and disgust in his heart, Rainier turned to Garrison and began the necessary wrestle with his sodden soul to prepare him for the day.

Cold water, hot coffee, bacon and biscuits, are not the most delicate of medicines for either the drink stupified or the convalescent, but when Killane lined up his prisoners in the courtyard at seven o'clock both Garrison and Rainier were there, the latter astonished at the evident preparations made to work them in a "stone-gang."

It seemed incredible that Americans should be marched out on the streets of Ilo-Ilo to break stone for the roads, but he realized that it would be useless to remonstrate with the sergeant. His pride forbade him pleading his sickness and indeed he felt so much better as to be almost cheerful. As to the rank injustice of working a shipwrecked journalist in a stone gang of "bobtailed" soldiers and dissolute beach-combers, the thought was abhorrent and alluring by turns. No man not a journalist by instinct would have suffered the injustice without protest but he allowed a sledge to be handed him by a matter-of-fact guard, and walked out into the sunlight of the town in company with twenty other men. These he shortly found to be either dishonorably discharged soldiers being held until transported to the Federal prison in "the States," nondescripts who had been living on native women in filthy shacks, or else pitiable wrecks of the "bino" habit, such as Garrison. He was surprised that Garrison, so indignant yesterday, made no trouble whatever for the sergeant or the guards. He avoided Rainier's eye, answered his remarks with gloomy monosyllables and seemed in a semi-stupor from his smuggled bottle.

CHAPTER VI.

"Mac Cuts in on General Principles."

The squad worked within a hundred yards of the Fort for not more than three hours, breaking stone for the causeway, and were then marched back into the Fort for dinner and a long "siesta."

Rainier had had his fill of experience by noon and was glad of the chance to rest. His story had gradually worked out among his fellows and they had in consequence kept well to themselves.

At half-past three came a second fiery test. This time the languid squad was led down into the town and had it not been that the sun was as molten lead on his cranium Rainier would have noticed that their first halt was amongst a mass of broken stone lying directly beneath the spacious overhanging veranda of a building of importance, proclaimed such by the flag extending out into the street above its arched entrance and the sentry sweltering beneath its folds.

The street was quite deserted.

Looking up from his feeble attempt to crack a lime stone slab into pebbles he could see a good three blocks in either direction. There was no prospect but the closely built houses steaming in the humid heat.

Not even a slouching native relieved the desolation, and the only sound was the chink-chink of the lazy sledges and an occasional imprecation from a convict.

With molten metal flowing over his skull, with copious salty sweat streaming into his eyes, and with a deathly weakness staggering him, Rainier worked listlessly on, collapsing finally into a sitting position on a block of stone and at last letting his sledge slide from his fingers. The guards themselves were scarcely moving, in such a furnace. Thus it was that the afore-mentioned verandah above them filled with cheerful noises at four o'clock and the casual eyes of nurses and officers looked down with comfortable criticism upon an almost somnolent work-party.

A penetrating masculine sentence even made itself articulate to Rainier's dizzy mind.

"Looks as though they had the sleeping sickness, Miss Royce?"

There was a contralto response that the mentally quickened journalist could not catch. But he lifted up his eyes to the balcony above him and the narrowness of Calle Real gave him in clear relief, against the cool shadows behind them, the light dresses of several ladies.

Yes, and one of them was the figure of the beauty of yesterday, Miss Royce. Beside her stood an officer in white uniform, not a square-jawed typical soldier of the clean-cut kind, but one of those slender little desk hunters that diminish the efficiency of every army—a dapper little military dude, a squire of ladies, an aversion to men. Back beyond these two distinct faces were other male figures in cool white duck.

At the sound of the voices above them the corporal of the guard with his two privates had sprung stiffly to his feet, the prisoners began a steady chink-chink with their hammers, but Rainier sat quietly on his stone, a sudden warm anger giving him a lease of vitality.

The slim officer was bending over the veranda rail. As he did so the large form of a strikingly handsome fellow stepped to the side of Miss Royce.

There was no mistaking the man.

As by instinct Rainier rose to his feet. The man above him was the man with whom he had wrestled in the Nagasaki dive.

The slim officer was speaking to the corporal who was standing in the hot street at an elaborate "attention."

"Corporal, take that scare crow collection out of sight and hearing of these ladies."

"Yes, sir." The corporal's voice was suspiciously obsequious.

"And give that lazy fellow in gray a little extra exercise."

Before the corporal could respond, Rainier was responding, himself. He looked squarely up into the face of Miss Royce, for the words were in reality for her.

"Let me inform you that I have determined to strike," he began.

But he was instantly interrupted. The nearest private had jumped to his side and faced him sharply away from the verandah.

There was a stir on the verandah, a chorus of feminine ejaculations. Rainier wrenched himself loose from the clutch of the guard and turned, struggling about.

The doctor was watching him intently.

"I appeal," he cried. "I appeal to you, doctor. You remember me, on the "Hyson." He tore the hand of the guard from his mouth.

A second soldier started toward him.

"Shut your head," commanded the corporal.

"Just one sentence. I'm not trying to insult these ladies; I am being unjustly treated and I demand a hearing. That physician in the verandah knows who I am. I appeal to him for justice. We came over in the same transport. You remember me, sir!"

As he finished Rainier stood quietly, while the guards, as if against their own wills, stood on either side of him, with their faces turned upward to the doctor, who was now bent over the rail with his face marked by something akin to horror. His raised eyebrows, his relaxed mouth, his hands gripping nervously the rail of the balcony and his sudden lividness were all apparent to the group below.

At his side appeared the faces of the entire verandah party, and among these the clearest marked of all to the prisoner below was the face of Miss Royce, a face of eager interest.

The whole scene was one of absolute stillness for the passing of a dozen seconds, the doctor's face slowly gathering composure, his jaw at last snapping shut and his figure straightening away from the rail. His eyes were still held on Rainier. Rainier heard his voice saying evenly:

"To the best of my knowledge, Major Kelley, I have never seen the fellow before. He was certainly not on 'The Hyson.' I knew every man on board intimately. He was not one of them."

"You are a finished liar."

It seemed to Rainier as though the words were spoken without his own volition, they had leaped from his lips unbidden.

Suddenly made alert, he had as suddenly become dull and wrathful. He felt himself jerked down the street and heard the clatter of the stone gang marching sullenly about him.

He stumbled on for perhaps half a dozen blocks, tears of mortification welling up over his hot eyes, when he became conscious of a jingle of hoofs coming up from the rear.

It became louder and still louder, and then a courier leaning from a pony's back circled to the head of the detachment and raised his hand. The nondescripts halted in the heat expectantly.

The courier was no other than the youthful McBurney.

"I've got a man here, corporal," he was saying, "The General's orders to Provo. I'm to take him right over to my quarters now."

The dusty corporal was reading a slip of creased paper. He nodded his head toward the verandah.

"That's him," he said almost genially. "Take him along, Pilot, and good luck to you."

A moment later McBurney and Rainier were alone on the sultry road, McBurney having dismounted, had slipped his slender arm around the correspondent, and his face was a mingling of anger and concern. As for Rainier he was only conscious of two things.

He knew that he was burning with a double fire, a pitiless sun above his head, a blazing fever within him. And he knew that he had found a friend and was free.

Suddenly he lurched against McBurney.

Theme for the Day.—The Name Above All.

Scripture.—And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross. Wherefore also God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name.—Phil. 2:8, 9.

The head that once was crowned with thorns,
  Is crowned with glory now;
A royal diadem adorns
  The mighty Victor's brow.

The highest place that heaven affords,
  Is his by sovereign right;
The King of kings, and Lord of lords,
  He reigns in glory bright.
    —T. Kelly ("Crowned with Honor").

Prayer.—Our Father in heaven, our hearts are filled with gladness at the thought of our Savior's glorious life. The shame and humiliation to which he submitted have long since been forgotten in the greatness of his exaltation. We hail him as our Master and Lord. We submit our lives to his direction and control: and on this holy day, that speaks of his return from the gates of death, we pledge him anew our loyalty and love. In his name we make our prayer. Amen.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 19.

Theme for the Day.—The Resistless Blessing.

Scripture.—How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? And how shall I defy whom Jehovah hath not defied? Behold, I have received commandment to bless; and he hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it.—Num. 23: 8, 20.

But, like the Midianite of old,
Who stood on Zophim, heaven-controll'd,
I feel within mine aged breast
A power that will not be repress'd.
It prompts my voice, it swells my veins,
It burns, it maddens, it constrains!—
O'ermaster'd yet by high behest,
I bless thee, and thou shalt be bless'd!
—Sir Walter Scott ("The Lord of the Isles").

Prayer.—Our Father, Thou hast led us in safety through the wilderness, and hast brought us to the borders of our land of promise. Thou hast turned our darkness into daylight; and the shadow of death into the dayspring of peace. We have seen the curse turned to blessing, and the rough ways made straight before our feet. For these mercies we thank Thee with full hearts, and we crave the continuance of Thy favor until the journey's close. We ask for Thy mercy's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 20.

Theme for the Day.—Winter's Breath.

Scripture.—Out of the chamber of the south cometh the storm, and cold out of the north. Job. 37:9.

He casteth forth his ice like morsels; who can stand before his cold? Psalm 147:17.

Like some lorn abbey now, the wood
  Stands roofless in the bitter air;
In ruins on its floor is strewed
  The carven foliage quaint and rare,
And homeless winds complain along
The columned choir once thrilled with song.
    —James Russell Lowell ("December").

Prayer.—Through all the changes of the year Thou has brought us in safety, our good Father. We approach the end of the season with deep thankfulness that we have been kept in Thy loving care. Thine are all the gifts of the year; the beauty and fertility of spring, the warmth and fruitfulness of summer, the glory of autumn, and the cold and snow of winter. Help us to delight in each season, and to labor to make our lives complete in all the round of joy and fruitfulness. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21.

Theme for the Day.—The Great Transformation.

Scriptures.—They had rest from their enemies, and the month was turned unto them from sorrow to gladness.—Esther 9:22.

For our light affliction which is for the moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory. 2 Cor. 4:17.

Shall I look back, and see the great things small;
  The toilsome path, God's training for my feet,
  The pains that never had been worth my tears?
Will some great light of rapture, bathing all,
  Make bygone woe seem joy; past bitter, sweet?
Shall I look back and wonder at my fears?
—Louise Chandler Moulton ("Shall I Look Back?").

Prayer.—We have been amazed, O our God, at the way along which Thou hast led us. Often when we thought the road was too steep the difficulties too great, the trials too heavy, we have obtained unexpected strength. And then we have looked back to see how our troubles were changed to blessings, and our sorrows too great joy. Even so do for us evermore. We would put our trust in Thee, and go on, with fresh courage. In Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22.

Theme for the Day.—The Sin of Uselessness.

Scripture.—I was hungry, and ye did not give me to eat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Matt. 25:42, 43.

Unto the man of yearning thought
And aspiration, to do nought
Is in itself almost an act,—
Being chasm-fire and cataract
Of the soul's utter depths unseal'd.
Yet woe to thee if once thou yield
Unto the act of doing nought!
    —D. G. Rossetti ("Soothsay").

Prayer.—Our holy Lord, we confess the weakness and sinfulness of our lives. We have often turned away from Thee to seek our own desires. And often when we have done no evil, we have undertaken nothing of good, and so have been guilty of usefulness and neglect. From this sin of indifference and idleness set us free, O Father, we know that we have no time to waste, for we shall not pass this way again. Lead us into fruitful effort, and deliver us from profitless lives. We ask in the name of the Christ. Amen.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 23.

Theme for the Day.—Peace and Good-Will.

Scripture.—And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on heart peace among men in whom he is well pleased. Luke 2:13, 14.

Love, which is sunlight of peace
  Age by age to increase,
Till anger and hatred are dead.
  And sorrow and death shall cease;
"Peace on earth and good-will;"
Souls that are gentle and still Hear the first music of this Far off, infinite bliss.
    —Edwin Arnold.

Prayer.—Our gracious God, with keen expectancy of blessing, and humble thankfulness for Thy favor, we approach the great Christmas festival. We do not keep it as those who observe times and seasons. We know that to Thee all times are alike sacred. And yet we would discern the meaning of the recurring day set by centuries of faith as at least an appropriate period for thoughts of the nativity. We would make the word of peace our own, and seek to promote the arrival of an age of good-will among all men. Amen.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24.

Theme for the Day.—The Star and the King.

Scripture.—And they, having heard the king, went their way; and lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. Matt. 2:9.

For he must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. 1 Cor. 15:25.

Oh, not alone because His name is Christ,
  Oh, not alone because Judea waits
This man-child for her King, the Star stands still.
  The universe must utter and fulfil
  The mighty voice which states,
The mighty destiny which holds,
  Its keynote and its ultimate design.
—Helen Hunt Jackson ("A Christmas Symphony").

Prayer.—O God, who hast set Thy stars in the firmament to give light and guidance to men, we have read with fresh interest the story of the Star, and the Sages who came from the east to the feet of the infant Christ. We would not miss the lesson of their coming, but would bring our own offerings, seeing again his Star flaming in the sky. Speed us on our way to the place where the young child abides, and there bid us rest and adore. We pray in his name. Amen.

Hamilton College Notes

Among the recent additions to the library facilities of the college, none is of greater interest than the old Latin and Saxon code of laws prevalent in England before the Norman Conquest. This volume was published by the command of King William IV, and has long been the property of Grosvenor House. Through Bernard Quaritch, the Latin antiquarian, the treasure was secured. Through the effort of Miss Caroline Berry, of the college faculty, an interesting collection of American pottery was recently exhibited. This included Navajo, Pueblo, and Mexican wares, and also, specimens of Biloxi, Newcomb, Zanesville, Dickens, Rookwood, Van Briggle, Teco and Grueby inventions.

Doctor Shearin will attend the annual session of the Modern Language Association of America to be held in New York City the week after Christmas. Before this body, he will present a paper dealing with a subject of literary interest.

For several years Hamilton College has been represented in the foreign field by its living link, Miss Miller, a former member of the faculty. Within the past few days the annual pledges for her support were taken. Owing to renewed enthusiasm as well as to the increased enrolment of the college, the amount thus subscribed was over twice as large as for previous years.

HOME AND THE CHILDREN

Bedtime

When the sun has gone to bed,
Shiny clouds around its head,
When the clovers go to sleep,
And the birds forget to peep.

I go slowly up the stairs,
Kneel and say my sleepy prayers;
From my bed against the wall,
I can hear the crickets call.

Every twinkler in the sky,
Looks at me with merry eye,
They are little friends of mine,
Don't you think the stars are fine?

Mother Moon looks in to see
If I'm comfy as can be;
Course I'm not a bit afraid
With the sky-folks God has made.

—May Elizabeth White.

"Nutsy"

"Grandpa! grandpa!" called Donald, running into the house one frosty morning last fall, "What do you think? All those walnuts I gathered yesterday and put in the woodshed in a basket are gone. Did you put them anywhere else?"

"No, I did not," answered grandfather, putting on his overcoat to go down town, "I saw the basketful last night. Look around and perhaps you'll find them."

Donald hunted and hunted for those lost nuts, but a single one did he find.

Monday morning, before the washwoman came, mother went into the woodshed to get down the washboiler, which was hanging on a high nail. A moment later Donald heard his mother call him, and came running. He climbed up and looked where she pointed. There in the boiler were his lost nuts,—at least a quarter of a bushel.

Mother pointed to the rafters at the other end of the shed. There sat a little red squirrel, his tail erect, his little feet spread wide, holding tight, and his head cocked first on one side and then on another, while he chattered and scolded at the giants who had found his winter supplies.

"Do you suppose he did it?" asked Donald.

"I don't doubt it," laughed mother, as she carefully lifted the boiler down and emptied the nuts into the basket. "It was too good a chance for him to lose."

"He must have worked pretty hard," said Donald, "to carry such a lot of nuts so quickly. Did he put them all in his cheeks?"

"They are the only pockets squirrels have," answered mother.

When grandpa came home that evening, he was told all about it.

"Well, well," he laughed, "I think I'll have to see if I can make that squirrel a house, and then perhaps he will live here in the woodshed."

Next day grandpa took a wooden box and put a layer of sawdust on the bottom. Then he laid some boards over that, making a little floor.

Next he nailed a partition in the box, and half filled the smaller part with fallen leaves.

"Nutsy's bedroom," explained grandpa. In the other section he scattered a handful of dried pumpkin seeds.

"The dining-room, I know!" explained the delighted Donald.

"Yes," said grandpa, "Now I'm going to make him a front door." And he cut a hole in one end just about big enough for a fat little squirrel to squeeze through.

"Now for the roof," said he, nailing on the lid of the box. Then grandpa solemnly tacked a card above Nutsy's front door. It read:—

Furnished Room to Let
For Single Gentleman

But would you believe it? Although dainties were scattered along the high pathway that led to the "Furnished Rooms," Nutsy would not live there. He liked his own cosy, hidden nook better.

As the days grew colder, and nothing seemed left for Nutsy outdoors, Grandpa hung ears of corn on the now leafless walnut tree, and now and then a can filled with pumpkin-seeds. Nutsy would come and, with a whisk of his bushy tail and a cock of his bright little head, settle himself to the enjoyment of the feast.

Although the children tried to coax him to eat from their hands, and laid out tempting trails of peanuts and popcorn from the tree to porch, he would never be tamed. He accepted all bounty as his just due, but gave no favors except his own bright, cheery, frisky little presence.

Once or twice he had eaten the corn scattered on his dining-room floor, or picked up a choice pumpkin-seed or two on the door-sill, but as for staying in a strange house over night—no, indeed!

One day in the late spring, when the woodpile in the shed was almost gone, grandpa found behind some old boards in a well-sheltered corner the cosiest of little nests, well lined and padded with dried grass and leaves, where Nutsy had spent the long winter nights.—Lillian Kennedy Wyman, in Sunday School Times.

At Whose Home?

A beautiful little canary came flying by, and settled down on the branch of a honeysuckle. "I'm so tired," he said. "I haven't found a realy happy home yet. I'm sure, though, that no one would be unkind or unhappy in such a charming place as this. I think I'll make my home here."

But just then a dog came around the corner of the porch, limping and crying, for a boy was running after him, striking him cruelly with a big stick.

"O! O!" said the bird, and away he flew. "I couldn't stay there. That boy would surely be unkind to me." And he flew to a window sill of a fine stone house in a beautiful garden.

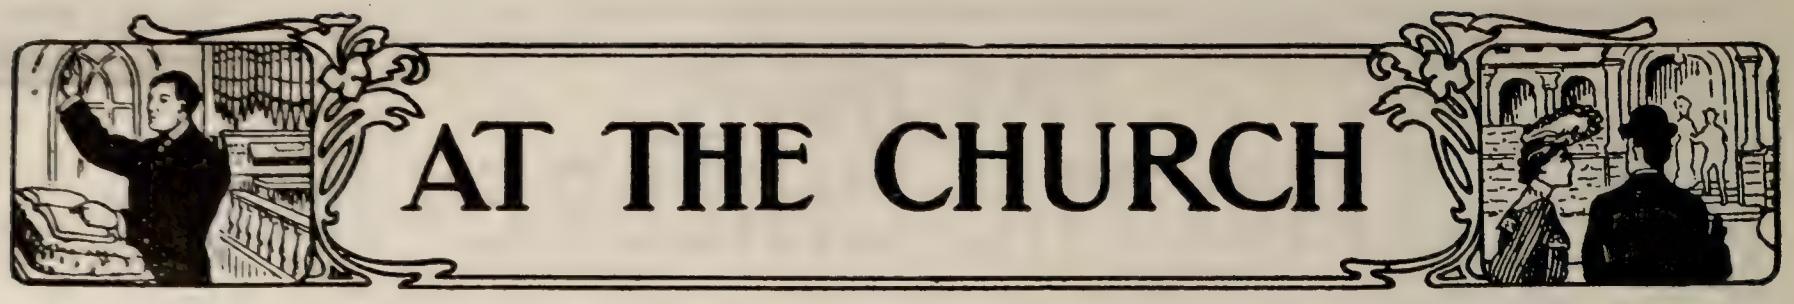
"What a lovely home! I'm sure I can stay here." But there were sounds of crying from the room within, and, peeping in, he saw two little sisters quarreling over a doll.

"Let go! That's my doll!" "No, you shan't have it! I want to play with it!" And in the struggle the poor little doll was pulled to pieces.

"Dear, O dear!" chirped the poor little bird. "They might try to do that with me. I don't want to live here." On he flew, from home to home, finding unkindness so often that at last he sank down, worn out, on a perch to die, his poor little heart almost broken with sadness. Suddenly he felt a warm hand close over him, and a soft, kind little voice said: "Why, you little thing! O, mother, see this dear little bird! Please let me keep him. I'll take good care of him, and not let a thing hurt him."

"Very well, dear, you may. Now go and feed him." And the little canary found happiness and kindness at last, and sang and made the little child happy for being so good to him.

Do you suppose any little bird would have to fly away sorrowfully from your home?—Child's Gem.



More Man Than Monk

From Arthur C. McGiffert's "Martin Luther and His Work" in the December Century.

The surprising thing about Luther's entrance into the monastery was not the fact iself, but the lateness of conversion which led to it. The experience through which he passed is apt to come earlier in life, if it comes at all. But Luther was later than most men in some of the other experiences of his life as well as this, and it was a happy thing for him that it was so. That the coming reformer spent his most impressionable years not within the walls of a cloister, but in the bracing and expanding atmosphere of a great university, mingling intimately with some of the brightest and most eager minds of his age, sharing in their ambitions, their labors, and their pleasures, was of incalculable benefit to him and to the Protestant Church, whose founder he became. Not in the monastery merely did he get his training, and not out of its retired sanctity alone did the great movement come. The larger world had a hand in making it and him. Though set apart by his monastic vow for more than fifteen years, he never lost his touch with human interests. Devout and zealous monk as he was, he was always more a man than a monk.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Spirit of Christmas*

There is at first an element of surprise in the choice of this day as the occasion of the nativity festival. It is difficult to understand how the tradition in reference to the birth of Jesus attached itself to a date so little in keeping with the events which are narrated by the Gospels. Probably any other season of the year would have been more likely as the date of Jesus' birth. Certainly the rainy season of December would be the time when shepherds would be least likely to be out with their flocks on the hills.

And yet there may be a closer connection between the date and the fact that is apparent upon the surface. The early church seems to have made no attempt to fix the time of the nativity. It was not generally observed by the eastern church prior to the time of Chrysostom in the fourth century, but in the western church it may have been earlier. In fact, various periods were held by different sections of the church. Some observed the festival in the month of May, others in April, and others in January.

The Sun's Return.

But most nations have kept a feast of some sort at the time of the winter solstice, when the sun begins to return to closer relations with the earth, bringing the heat and fertility of spring. Especially in northern countries has this been the fact. The long and bleak winter is very hard to bear. Therefore the moment at which there seems to be a turning of the hour-glass, and the sun actually begins his approach to greater friendliness, has always been a time of rejoicing with these northern people. The Celts and Germans have celebrated this season with great festivities from the oldest time. The heathen feast of the Yule-tide was held by the Germans in commemoration of the return of the fiery sun-wheel. At such a time they believed the gods to be nearer to them, and these favorable influences continued the twelve nights from December 25 to January 6.

These customs and beliefs passed over from Teutonic heathenism to Christianity, and have survived in Christian nomenclature to the present time. The names of the days of our week we owe to the Scandinavians, as also the name for the feast of the resurrection, Easter, which was in reality the title of a Norse divinity. Similarly the joy of Yule-tide, when the sun once more began his conquest of the powers of darkness and cold, was connected with the most significant fact in the history of Christianity, the birth of him who came as the Sun of righteousness, and went forward in growth and power to win his place as the prophet of God and Savior of mankind.

The Christmas Festivities.

Just as the Yule-tide festivities represented in dramatic ways the processes of nature and gave voice to the joy of the people at the promise of returning warmth, so the Christmas time has attracted to itself those beautiful and significant observances which mark the joy of childhood, the generous treatment of the poor, and the bestowal of gifts upon those we love, because all these things seem harmonious with the day that celebrates the birth of Christ.

The story of Christmas will always include the mystery of the divine and human in the life of Jesus, mingling in the events of the nativity. From every point of view that life is the nearest approach to the divine self-bestowal that the world has known. Whatever qualities one may assign to divinity are all embraced in the character of Jesus. He is the truest interpreter of God, the most beautiful incarnation of God in the most beautiful of forms. He is the union of the human and the divine, and all the centuries have stood with uncovered head in his presence.

The Human Story.

But the Christmas story equally emphasizes the human nature of our Lord. The simplicity and pathos of his natal experiences, the perplexity and suffering of his mother, the difficult shifts to which his parents were put in their effort to make provision for his physical needs, lend their charm to the story, for they reveal the reality of his human life. It is these two elements that find balanced and harmonious treatment in the narratives of the nativity. It is as if the writers, conscious that they were dealing with supremely valuable materials, strove to put the story into the most attractive and compelling form. And yet it is not the beauty of art, but of artlessness and sincerity.

There is the wonder of Jesus' birth, that mystery which our record affirms to have been so perplexing to Joseph. Then there was the song of the angels and their disclosure of the fact to the shepherds on the hillside. On the human side there are the commonplace and simple experiences of these peasants from Galilee, the wondering interest of the shepherds, the homely hospitality of the inn, too crowded to admit the strangers save to the stable-cave, and the one touch of common, human fellowship in the statement to the shepherds that they should find the babe wrapped in swaddling bands. That common custom of the time was observed by Mary as by every other mother in Palestine who brought forth a child that night. The mark of the truest divinity in the life of Jesus was this fellowship with all other children in the humilities of birth and infantile care.

Humanity's Interest in Jesus.

It must have been a rather obscure event, that of the coming of this child into our common human life. Yet in reality it had a meaning for every class in the social order. The shepherds who came to see the newborn child, belonged to the uncultured and toiling classes of their land. They had no other tribute to pay than that of respect and wonder. But there were other guests who arrived soon after from far distant lands. Perhaps some fragment of Hebrew prophecy had fallen into the hands of the Magi in far-off Persia. The world's expectation of a teacher or prophet who should rise somewhere in the West seemed to find realization in the birth of the young king of the Jews. And so these wise men came the long journey, bringing their gifts to the humble home into which Joseph had taken his wife and the child.

The concern manifested by poor and rich alike was the foretoken of the world's concern at the coming of our Lord. To every class of people his life is significant. No type of mind can remain indifferent to him. As the prophet Simeon said to Mary, his mother, "He is set for the fall and rising of many." No life remains the same after it has encountered him. If he is permitted to render the service he seeks, then that life is certain to rise to new altitudes of beauty and power. If his friendship is rejected, it must be on the ground of moral disinclination, which spells also moral decline to lower levels of conduct and of happiness.

Peace on Earth.

The coming of Jesus into the world was the harbinger of hope for all mankind. It was a note of peace upon earth, and goodwill among those who were sensitive to the appeal of the friendly and loving spirit. The work of Christ as the great peacemaker has been slow and disappointing, chiefly because his program never has been tried. But the nations are learning that it is impossible to foster the spirit of war in a civilization which Christ dominates. Increasingly terrible seems the destruction of human life in the arbitrament of international disputes. The heaviest price any nation has to pay is the price of war. It not only drains national revenues and ruins national happiness, but it shadows the future with the decline of vital efficiency in the coming generations. The nations of Europe that lost their best blood on the battlefield in the wars that were chiefly contests for military glory are paying a tremendous indemnity in the form of lessened efficiency of national stock, and decline in all the values of citizenship. War is too expensive a game to play at much longer, and it is the spirit of Jesus and of Christmas that has done more to impress this truth upon the nation than any other.

The Spirit of Good-Will.

But the spirit of Christmas is the spirit of good-will to all men. Where it prevails hatred cannot thrive, suspicion perishes, prejudice gives way to appreciation, and strife turns to mutual aid. It is this era of good-will that gradually dawns upon our world to-day. The waste of competition, the ruin and suffering of industrial misunderstanding, the evils wrought by the exploitation of forms of business which are unsocial and bad, are passing under the scrutiny of our age as never before.

The spirit of the Christmas time broods over our world like the Spirit of God at creation, and brings the new order of peace and goodwill out of chaos and conflict of hatred and brutality. And ever, if we have ears to hear their music, the Christmas angels are singing as of old their song of peace on earth and good-will to men. It is ours to join or to refuse. But never can we stop that anthem until all nations have joined in the refrain, and the Babe of Bethlehem has become the Teacher and the Friend of all mankind.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

By H. L. Willett

The new series of lessons which Dr. Willett will conduct each week during 1911 in the Christian Century, will begin next week. Many inquiries are being received at the office concerning this course. There will be classes in many schools which will adopt it as their text for next year. It will be the most informing and stimulating Sunday-school treatment appearing during the year. The publishers call attention to the advertisement elsewhere in this issue.. The following is an explanatory introduction prepared by Professor Willett as a general response to many inquiries concerning specific features.

As the Christian Century is to present to its readers a course of Biblical studies of special character during the year 1911, it may be well to state some of the reasons, which appears to make this plan desirable and some of the features which will be of special interest.

The Old Testament contains the total surviving literature of the Hebrew people, during the classic period, when the Hebrew language was a living tongue. But the portions of the Old Testament, which have given it the significance it has for religious life are those parts which were produced through the activities of the prophets.

Other parts of the Herbrew writings, such as the laws of the nation, the wisdom writings, the hymns of the temple, and the great apocalypses, are not without great beauty and value. Moreover, they are almost wholly pervaded by a deeply religious spirit. In fact religion in one form or another pervaded public and private affairs to such an extent that the community was almost as much church as state.

The Temple at Jerusalem.

The temple at Jerusalem and in earlier ages the local sanctuaries, exerted a profound influence upon the nation. Next to the kings and nobles the priests possessed more authority than any other class. Much of the daily life of the people, was ordered in accordance with beliefs and practices which were essentially religious in origin and significance.

Yet the prophets were the makers of Israel's nobler moral and spiritual ideals. Often at odds with the priests, as they were, and still more frequently called upon to denounce both rulers and people, they kept alive those sanctions of righteousness which gave Israel a unique place in ancient religious history, and prepared the world for truer conceptions of God and duty in later days.

It is natural, therefore, to speak of the prophets as the religious teachers of the nation, and through the nation, of the world. Yet in this series of studies it has seemed best to speak of them as the Moral Leaders of Israel. This choice of title has been deliberate and for the following, among many reasons:

Religion and Morality.

(1) The prophets were the first great teachers to make clear the intimate and essential connection between religion and the moral life. It is a singular fact that the religions of many nations, and even the Hebrew and Christian religions in certain periods, have been conceived as forms of worship rather than inspirations to honest and godly living. The prophets made this connection so clear that it could not be ignored.

(2) The prophets were keenly sensitive to the need of a social conscience in the nation. They were the friends of the poor, the advocates of the oppressed, the tribunes of the common people, the rebukers of iniquity and injustice wherever they saw it. In their days the nation had a far larger portion of political freedom than in the times of Jesus. It is not strange, therefore, that the prophets dealt more freely and directly with the social sins of their age than did the apostles, who lived under the fixed and arrogant authority of Rome. This fact makes the utterances of the prophets of immense value in all ages like our own, when the character of the social order is subjected to such close inspection and the arousal of the civic conscience is of such concern.

(3) The lives of the prophets, as well as their words, afford some of the most valuable material in our possession for the teaching of the moral life. They were, in varying degrees, the living embodiment of their messages. The life of an Amos or a Jeremiah affords not only the substance of ethical and religious instruction, but as well its fine illustration in character and conduct.

These are some of the reasons why the study of the lives and preaching of the prophets has awakened so much interest in our times. So similar are the social conditions, in spite of the centuries intervening, that the protests of these ancient preachers against the sins of their time read like pages of contemporary history. The sermons of Micah and Isaiah might have been uttered yesterday, and as one reads them over they seem hardly dry from the press.

Growth of Messianic Hope.

The series of studies will begin in the Christian Century next week, and will continue through the year 1911. There will be fifty-two sections, covering the entire period of prophetic activity from the days of Moses till the close of the Old Testament ministry of the prophets. The points of emphasis will be the times in which the prophet lived, his relation to the people and the government, the chief events of his life, the essential features of his message, and the results of his work. In particular the growth of the Messianic hope will be traced in each period.

As the work of the prophets continued throughout the Old Testament age, and was the most vital feature of the history, the studies will present not only the picture of prophetic activity, but the essentials of Old Testament history as well.

But most of all, the growth of Old Testament religion will be made clear, with its unique conception of God, its high ideals of conduct, and its preparation for the fuller manifestation of the divine character and purpose in the ministry of Christ.

Definite Section of Scripture.

Each lesson will present a definite section of Scripture for class or individual study, a treatment of the particular theme and the text in relation to the general subject of the course, suggestions regarding helpful literature, and such questions as will serve to make clear and enforce the lesson.

As the International Lessons for 1911 cover the period from the division of the tribes to the close of the Old Testament, the course here outlined will prove of great value to those who use the International studies. One of the distinct advantages of this course is the arrangement of all the characters, events and writings in the order in which they came, rather than in the order of the Old Testament books.

As a result of the study of this series, one ought to have a clear and connected knowledge of the great moral and spiritual leaders of the Old Testament, and the contribution each made to the higher life of Israel and the world.

The way to overcome our troubles is to bear them; the way to conquer our crosses is willingly to lay them on the shoulders and never stoop under them. The accepted sorrow is a pointless arrow.—Alexander Maclaren.

More Family Pride

Mr. Morrison's recent editorial, "A Book I Haven't Read" lets down the bars of dignified self-restraint, and tempts me to follow suit in mentioning another of our family achievements that has just come to light. If I seem too exuberant and fail to repress some of those instinctive feelings of family pride and concern that most of us keep in the basement of our intellectual castles, the editor must remember that he did it first.

For time out of mind I have scanned the reviews and magazines for some mention of the topics that so concern our own brotherhood. An amendment to the title of the Prayer Book or some hair-splitting argument as to the proper set of ecclesiastical millinery whose very name is Greek to me will fill columns, while one of the finest and hottest scraps the country ever saw, with the faithful so worked up that they write to Cincinnati by the thousand renewing their subscriptions and getting a fountain pen to boot—all this goes unnoticed by the high-browed paragraphers and reviewers of an effete and subsidized press.

Dsciples Disregarded in Press.

For example, The Dallas News, published in a city and a state where the Disciples of Christ are strong, failed to print a line of telegraphic report from the Topeka convention; but at the same time published long stories daily from the Episcopal meeting in Cincinnati. This notwithstanding the fact that we out-number the Episcopalians in the territory where the News circulates at least five to one. This is only one of many equally strange and unreasonable slights to our religious body.

"The Missionary Review of the World," at least until a year or two ago, since which time I have not read it, was especially obnoxious in this respect. I took pains more than once, as did others who were serving our missionary interests, to send the Review illustrated articles concerning notable achievements of our work; but they were all ignored. Secretaries Corey and McLean have occasionally been heard from in the Review, but very seldom.

If my memory serves me right, the "Literary Digest" did not even notice the Pittsburg Centennial, and as for quoting from one of our religious weeklies, I had long ago given up any hope for such attention.

Saving Chicago.

Imagine my surprise, then, when I found the leading article in the department of last week's Digest called "The Religious World," devoted to a quotation from the "Christian Century." At last we are on the map! At least Chicago is located, for that is the subject of the article. "Saving Chicago" is the heading under which most of the Century's excellent estimate of the Gypsy Smith and Chapman revivals is reproduced.

I am no theologian, but I do love clear-cut, forceful English (and editorials free from cant, couched in the language of today.) An editor may be so safe and sane that his tripod will not need oiling once in a thousand years. But give me the man, who, unsatisfied with anything short of the ideal for which Jesus laid down his life, for which Paul faced the beasts at Ephesus and which led Tolstoy to brave the jibes of social stand-patters, will dare to express his deepest yearnings and seekings after the truth.

Why The Christian Century Helps.

This is why the Century helps me. Personally I can not follow those whose original research and scholarship has led them to take so-called higher critical views. But even in my ignorance and in my rather literal acceptance of a religious program and a Bible that seems to need little explaining, I fail to see any reason for the blind fear and even hatred that so many of my brethren show toward any attempted restatement of the Eternal and Living Truth.

What is history for if not to show us the inevitable recurrence of such situations as we face today? "There is nothing new under the sun." What if Luther, if Wesley, if Campbell had subsided under the chorus of protests that greeted their innovations. Old and cherished views and interpretations were displaced by newer, saner and more livable restatements of the truth that was, is and shall be. What assurance have we that Campbell, Errett or even McGarvey has the final word, was foreordained to seal the Book of the Living Truth?

Jesus More Pragmatic Than Dogmatic.

Pragmatic comes far nearer than dogmatic to characterizing the life and sayings of our Lord. Royal J. Dye and Bolenge will be remembered when the names of our fiercest debators and ablest proselyters have crumbled into dust.

So I am thankful for the Christian Century's attitude of striving after the truths, rather than claiming to have been made its sole and final respository. At last we have a paper that can say the needed word in due season without having to consider policy, precedent and "orthodoxy" in its perverted sense. I admire The Century's grit and sanctified gumption and wait with confidence the time when its influence shall be vastly enlarged not only among appreciative outsiders and the thoughtful minority of our own people, but among those now seemingly content with outworn catchwords and a dogmatism as narrow as it is self-sufficient.

A Notable Pastorate

One of the most interesting and impressive of recent events in church circles, and outside of church circles, in California was the royal reception given to A. C. Smither by the great First Church of Los Angeles. The occasion was in honor of the completion of a twenty years' pastorate. This achievement places Mr. Smither in company with a few of the most noted, select, and efficient ministers in the brotherhood, and the First Church in company with a few of the best known and most powerful of our congrega tions. An explanation of this exceptional pastorate will give large credit to both pastor and people. The church has been characterized by sweet reasonableness in their demands and expectations. They have given the minister most cordial and loyal support. They have provided him with assistants and helpers of many kinds. They have not been fidgety, flighty, or finnicky. They have stood by their pastor. They have held up his hands. They have talked him up and not down. They have believed more in prayer than in criticism.

A Long Pastorate God's Gift.

The pastor himself comes for a large share of the credit for this achievement. A theological student asked Beecher what was the cause of so many short pastorates. Beecher replied, "The Lord's mercy toward the parish." In this case the Lord's mercy toward the parish is giving them a long pastorate. When I write my biography of Smither I will write of the man in the pulpit and in the parish. Some one divides ministers into preachers, parsons, and parsonettes. Smither is a preacher. I heard a man say: "The Lord makes preachers, man makes clergymen." Smither is not a clergyman. He could not have held his pulpit so long if he had not been a great student. He knows books, and he knows the Book. He knows men. He knows life. You can add up all some preachers have to say and have nothing to carry. Some preachers aim at nothing and make center shots. Smither is not the preacher of whom it was said: "Ten thousand thousand are his texts, but all his sermons one." A woman said to her friend, "We have the smartest preacher. He can preach more sermons from the same text than any man I ever knew." Her friend replied: "Our preacher is just as smart. He can preach the same sermon from more texts than any man I ever knew." Smither is not a dispenser of "dried tongue." He understands that the oil for the sanctuary must be "beaten oil."

Smither's sermons are Biblical. No other kind would satisfy the people for so long a time. It is said that the Bible might be wiped out of existence and many a star preacher would not miss it. Smither would. His occupation would be gone. With him the Word is the seed of the kingdom and the sword of the spirit. Smither's preaching is broad in its scope. He champions every cause commended by the brotherhood. His preaching is serious and dignified, but it is not dull. No hearer writes on the fly-leaf of his hymnal what Pope wrote on his:

"I whisper, 'Gracious God,
What have I done to merit such a rod,
That all this shot of dullness thus should be
By this thy blunderbuss discharged on me.'"

It is not a part of the formation of the First Church for the choir to sing just before the preacher begins his sermon the anthem: "Lord protect us while we sleep."

Smither's sermons are evangelical and evangelistic. His thought is not "evangelical" in a narrow, constricted sense. His mind is open to all things that are true, and he is a seeker after truth. His preaching wins men to Christ. Dry baptisteries are not more conducive to long pastorates than dry sermons.

Sermons Evangelical.

Smither is not theatrical or sensational. A parishioner complained to his bishop that the pews of his church were empty, while the church house across the street was crowded. The parishioner said, "Oh, if our preacher could only draw like that preacher! Can't you send us a preacher like that?" The bishop knew the sensational character of that preacher's performances, and replied, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's ass." Smither's preaching is of the kind that draws and holds. Smither is as faithful and efficient in the parish as in the pulpit. He is not only on to his job, but on his job. He is not the preacher who was "invisible all week and incomprehensible on Sunday." He loves his people. He is a good shepherd. He leads and feeds and defends the flock.

Affection Not Weakening.

Mr. Smither was never so strong in the confidence and affection of his people as he is to-day. It would be interesting to give statistics concerning his work through these twenty years, but his work is known far and wide. His influence and that of the great First Church is felt unto the uttermost parts of the earth.

The best thing that can be said of this preacher is that his life stands back of his sermons as their reinforcement and the explanation of their power. He is not the preacher of whom it was said that he ought to be taken up into heaven Monday morning and let down again Saturday night. His life is an open book, known and read of all men.

A short time ago a correspondent of the Los Angeles Times wrote an article on "A Man of Achievement." At its close he said, "that man is Rev. A. C. Smither, pastor of the First Christian Church." The mayor of the city was present at the reception to bear the same testimony. A representative of he Federation of Churches more than seconded the motion. C. C. Chapman was there to speak for Southern California. Hundreds of congratulatory letters were there to bring the greetings of the brotherhood. It is the hope of thousands that this notable pastorate may continue many years and that its power and blessedness may be even greater in the years to come. FRANK M. DOWLING.

Medical Missionary Conference

The third annual meeting of the Medical Missionary Conference will be held at the Sanitarium in Battle Creek, Mich., Jan. 5 to 8, 1911. The conference will open at noon of the 5th, with a banquet to all visitors. Missionaries and missionary officers will be entertained free for one week. It is expected that a large number of missionaries both medical and evangelical will be present, including men and women of prominence. We are asked to extend to all missionaries, on furlough or retired, a cordial invitation to attend this gathering, which promises to be a season of inspiration and spiritual power. The conference is interdenominational, all Christian bodies meet on the same footing. Information will be cheerfully given by the secretary, Geo. C. Tenney, Sanitarium, Battle Creek, Mich.

for Jesus, and living, in principle at least, as Jesus lived. Sin, I would teach, is sin against God because it is sin against man. I know of nothing that is sin if it does not wrong man. Salvation is love; and love is salvation. Sin is selfishness. We are redeemed when the life of love possesses us through and through. In these days of stress, the note of individualism may be overdone in our evangelism. The prophets preached righteousness and Jesus preached the kingdom. That the federation of labor can support 40,000 of their brethren must be pleasing to Christ.

Night after night we sang "There are angels hovering around," and doubtless this was literally true. This universe must quiver with life. But the tangible angels to the hungry in Chicago tonight are those that take bread to them.

We need the social note in our evangelistic meeting, and we need the mystical, the deeply religious note in our social service organizations. Good deeds, without Christian passion, will not carry far. And salvation in the next world without a heart to bleed for the suffering and a hand to help the needy would be a salvation without Christ.

I think the results were worth while. They were at least to me, personally. I need a periodical toning up. The dust and smoke of Chicago gets to have too large a place in my life. I need to visit the New Jerusalem frequently. Its glory makes me step quicker and more confidently. Very few additions to our churches will be secured as a result of the meetings. Remember the very small percentage of non-churchmembers that attended. But certainly an uplift came to the members that attended in the strength of which they will go forward for many days. It is now easier to do church work than before. Church members are more earnest and others are more susceptible.

All the Protestant churches united in these meetings. There were no doctrinal conflicts. Some day the church of the Christ who prayed for the union of his people will try to work together for a longer period. Protestantism in the cities awaits the power of getting and building together.

It is a sign that we have journeyed far on the pathway to peace when we can be thankful for our sorrows.

We may have the form of godliness without the power, but it is impossible to have the power without the form.—Edward Payson.

All the dangers which beset our piety lie in the humble and ordinary matters of life. Here, then, is the place where religion must make her conquests. Here she must build her barriers and take her stand.—Horace Bushnell.

Church Life

A good meeting is in progress at Paxton, Ill.

A. L. Drummond will take charge of the work at Norton, Kan., Jan. 1.

W. M. LeMay, of Anthony, Kan., is holding a series of meetings at Newton, Kan.

J. M. Miller has resigned his pastorate at Salamonie, Ind., to accept a call to Vaughnsville, O.

At last report from the Scoville meetings at Oklahoma City, Okla., there were 1,192 additions.

W. T. Fisher, of DesMoines, Ia., conducted three services at the annual rally day exercises at Clarion, Ia.

The meetings being held at First Church, Quincy, Ill., by the pastor, Clyde Darsie, continue with encouraging results.

Revival services are being held at Cloverdale, Ind., under the leadership of H. H. Adamson, of Bloomington, Ind.

J. H. Gilliland is in a meeting at Colfax, Ill., and the outlook promises one of the most helpful meetings this church has ever had.

The church at Burlington, Ia., has extended a call to M. C. Hutchinson, of Missouri Valley, Ia., to succeed Arthur Long, who recently resigned.

The meeting at Ames, Ia., has just closed with twenty additions. The pastor, M. E. Miller, was assisted by John P. Jesse, of Gower, Mo., and Charles E. McVay.

H. C. Williams, pastor at Fairfield, Neb., is conducting a series of revival services. He is assisting in the singing by L. C. Oberlies of Lincoln, Neb.

J. W. Hilton is leading the East Side church, Lincoln, Neb., in a steady progressive work. In January, he will begin an evangelistic campaign with home forces.

The congregation of Wilshire Boulevard Church, Los Angeles, Cal., will erect a new house of worship in the near future. William Clayton Bower is having a successful pastorate there.

The church at Paulding, O., where Claris Yeuell ministers, is closing a very profitable and pleasant year. Especial progress has been made along missionary lines, the offerings for all causes increasing.

A missionary rally was held at the church at Hebron, Neb., on Nov. 30. Several missionaries were present and steropticon views illustrating work on the different mission fields were shown.

W. W. Burks, who has had a successful pastorate at Nevada, Mo., has accepted a call to St. Louis, to succeed F. N. Calvin who took charge of the work at Warren, O., some months ago.

The men of Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., have planned to take personal charge of an evangelistic meeting to be held Jan. 1-15.

President Bates, of Hiram College, gave an address on "A Mission Worthy of a Man," last week at Warren, O., under the auspices of the Century Men's Club of Second Church.

The official board of First Church, Independence, Mo., has called F. F. Walters to the pastorate of the church. Mr. Walters came to Independence from Joplin, Mo., as temporary pastor, several months ago.

In the connection with the campaign will be given a men's supper on Tuesday evening in the armory, and several hundred men are expected to be present. Harry Monroe, of the Pacific Garden Mission of Chicago will be one of the speakers.

Charles E. Varney has closed a meeting at Charleston, Ill., with Geo. H. Brown, the pastor there. The meeting was successful in every way, seventy-five being added to the membership. Mr. Varney is now in a meeting with John M. Grimes at Beloit, Kan.

Walter C. Gibbs, of Harrison, O., has closed a meeting at New Holland, O., with E. L. Mitchell, the pastor, there. This meeting was the most successful in the history of the church and all departments of the work are stronger than ever before, Progress is being made at West Park Church, Indianapolis, Ind., where W. D. Bartle took up the work last September. Ten have been added to the membership and steps have been made to organize a men's brotherhood. A meeting is now being held, the pastors of the other churches of Indianapolis assisting in turn.

John D. Zimmerman, for some time pastor at Winchester, Kan., has resigned his charge to become superintendent of the Christian Endeavor movement among the Disciple churches in Kansas. Mr. Zimmerman is already well known as a worker in this department and will do much for the movement in that state.

A. N. Glover has just closed the first year of his pastorate at Fullerton, Cal. In that time there have been about seventy-five additions to the membership and the Sunday-school has nearly doubled in its attendance. A handsome new building, modern in every respect, was begun last August and will be completed shortly at a cost of about $13,500.

The Sunday-school at Massillon, O., which is in a contest with the Turtle Creek school has had record-breaking attendance and offerings recently. On Nov. 27 and Dec. 4, the attendance was 329 and 332 with offerings of $61.18 and $55.20. Mr. and Mrs. C. A. MacDonald are conducting a Sunday-school institute and evangelistic services at the Massillon church.

During his seven months' pastorate at Corning, Ia., O. W. Winter led his congregation into enlarged usefulness. Extensive repairs and improvements were made in the church building and all indebtedness was raised with a balance in the treasury. The attendance at all the services was greatly increased and a goodly number added to the membership. Mr. Winter has taken the work at Creston, Ia., and is now on the field.

About forty pastors in the vicinity of Hiram, O., met at the college recently in a conference, whose purpose was to bring the churches and college into a closer fellowship and reciprocal helpfulness. Far-reaching plans were discussed, looking forward to the greater enlargement and usefulness of the college. Lectures were given at the college last week by President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin College, and ex-Governor Folk, of Missouri.

Claire L. Waite is holding some excellent meetings in Wisconsin. He is now at Sugar Grove with good prospects.

After a successful pastorate of three years at Sterling, Ill. I. L. Parvin has resigned to accept a call to Auburn, N. Y. His work there will begin Jan. 1.

The Metropolitan Church, Chicago, gave a reception to its new pastor, J. D. DeWitt Hull and Mrs. Hull, last Thursday evening. A good program and refreshments were enjoyed.

A. H. Seymour is just closing four years of service as superintendent of schools in De Smet, S. Dak. He has combined with this work the pastoral charge over the church at Carthage. On Jan. 1 he takes up the principalship of the schools at Iroquois, S. Dak.

S. G. Buckner's new pastorate at Ashtabula, O., is prospering. C. W. B. M. day was celebrated and $100 raised to complete the living-link offering of $600 for missions. E. C. Davis, of India, is their representative on the foreign field. Mr. Buckner teaches a class of men which runs near the 100 mark constantly.

One successful, capable Sunday-school superintendent, G. B. Davis, of North Salem, Ind., suggests that instead of the usual Christmas tree this year the whole school take an offering for the Orphans' and Widows' Home and the Ministerial Relief Fund. This is a good suggestion, says J. H. Brooks, the pastor there, to make unanimous. To which we heartily agree.

Under the ministry of Sumner T. Martin for the past two months, the church at Rialto, Cal., is prospering. Nine have been added recently to the membership by baptism and letter. Teacher training and mission study classes have been formed and the attendance of the Sunday-school has been doubled. Graded lessons will be introduced shortly and the front rank standard will be the goal.

A missionary federation banquet was held recently at First Church, Lincoln, Neb. Three hundred of the best workers from the various churches of the city were there, and those in attendance feel it was the most significant meeting in the practice of Christian unity ever held in Lincoln. The spirit of the meeting was concentrated in the opening words of one of the speakers: "Conservation is in the air and the time has come for all Christians to conserve the interests of God's kingdom by banding themselves together."

The Foreign Society is distributing a series of Busy Men's Pamphlets on missions which are pointed, ringing, informing and stimulating. Missionary A. F. Hensey, who has been touring this country with Secretary E. W. Allen speaking in behalf of Congo missions, now finds that his secretarial companion has gathered up a number of the life-stories of his addresses and published them under the title, "Opals from Africa." These may be had by addressing the Foreign Society at Cincinnati.

The official board of First Church, Springfield, Ill., is voluntarily being reorganized on the limited term basis. Hitherto this church has elected elders and deacons to serve during good behavior. By the initiation of these same officers the church will henceforth elect one-third of the board annually. First church is strong in the possession of many capable men, holding positions of influence in the community. F. W. Burnham is the pastor.

The Sunday-school rally at Huntington, Ind., brought out an attendance of 1454, and an offering of $1,501.25—a marvelous record. All departments of this church's work are flourishing. The financial problem seems easily solved, with balances in all the treasuries. J. M. Vawter, of Sullivan, Ind., begins a meeting with Pastor Elmer Ward Cole on Jan. 8. The Netz sisters will sing. In two years $10,000 has been taken off the building indebtedness. It is expected the remainder will be wiped out soon. This is a splendid church.

Union revival services under the leadership of Henry Ostrum, evangelist, and John P. Hillis, song leader, began in Kankakee, Ill., Nov. 30. At this stage of the campaign everything points to a successful revival that shall be at least county-wide. The meetings are being held in the armory and at the men's meeting Sunday afternoon the building was crowded. The women's meeting held in the Baptist church and addressed by Mrs. W. O. Livingstone, was a great success and the building was packed. Six Protestant churches are affiliated in the movement, among which is the Central Christian Church, of which W. O. Livingstone is pastor.

W. J. Lhamon Commended

W. J. Lhamon, of Des Moines, has been with us for the past four Sundays, and as a result the church and the entire city have been greatly uplifted by his ministry. He is perfectly sane, strong and scholarly, and possesses a fine enthusiasm as he presents the claims of Jesus.

He is a rare combination of elements that make him desirable to any church that needs to be spiritually uplifted and instructed in the way of life.

One of the most interesting as well as helpful features of the meetings were his afternoon lectures on "The Character of Christ," and "Studies in Comparative Religion." The lectures in comparative religion are of university grade, having been given as credit work to university students. The classes in all of his lectures were uniformly large.

Another striking feature of his meetings was the large number of young men who came nightly to hear him preach. My hope is that he may be kept in the field, for he is the type of man and evangelist that our churches are most in need of.

Logansport, Ind. J. H. Craig.

That One Dollar a Day Proposition

If you read The Christian Century last week you are up to date, and have the newest thing in Ministerial Relief. It is a proposition by the Board to raise a fund this year sufficient to pay the most needy of our old preachers a sum equal to one dollar a day. This is more than double the amount we have ever paid any of them, but not more than will supply them with the necessaries of life. The proposition is worthy the Disciples of Christ, and the Disciples of Christ are worthy the proposition. A hundred years of history pleading for the restoration of New Testament Christianity makes it necessary that we do this thing. The urgency of the case compels us to do it. It is our duty to understand it, and our business to care for it. There is absolutely no excuse to further postpone or neglect it.

Of course there are other claims, and even urgent demands made upon us, but the claims of this ministry are before us now, and its support is due from us at this time. We should not allow anything, under any consideration, to interfere with the time of this offering. We must make the January payment sufficiently large to meet the winter's extra demands. Already the calls are coming for something more than we have been able thus far to pay. Brethren, do not let the day go by without making an offering, and then send it to us promptly. May the good spirit of the Master fill all your hearts.

A. L. Orcutt, President,
Board of Ministerial Relief.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Evangelist Shi-Ewei-biaco, of Chu Cheo, China, is sixty-six years old. He has outgrown his district and is becoming evangelist in general for our Chinese mission. He has held meetings in nearly every station. He is the grand old man of our Chinese mission. His salary is $75 a year, and about one-third of it he gives back to the work. The Chinese have no dentistry, and the good old evangelist's teeth have become very poor. In order to preserve him for long service, and to add to his comfort, our missionaries are presenting him with new teeth done by a Christian Chinese dentist, who took his training in Honolulu.

Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Shelton, of Batang, Tibet, hope to reach San Francisco the last of January. They are now in far West China, traveling over the high mountain trails with their faces set toward America.

F. E. Meigs, of Nankin, China, has just undergone a very critical operation in Cleveland, Ohio. At this writing he seems to be doing well. It is hoped this operation will result in restored health. He longs to return to his important work in Nankin, where he has spent nearly a quarter of a century. News comes that he has been re-elected as dean of the Biblical Department of the Union Nankin University.

Secretary E. W. Allen, of the Foreign Society, accompanied by O. J. Grainger, from India, and M. B. Madden, from Japan, has been conducting enthusiastic missionary rallies in Iowa, Nebraska and Kansas. After holidays Dr. C. L. Pickett, of the Phillipines, and J. S. McGavran, from India, will go with Mr. Allen through Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas and Missouri.

Arthur Braden, who served the church at Auburn for a number of years and recently was president of Keuka College, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Central Church of Syracuse and has entered upon his duties. The best wishes of his many friends are extended to him as he enters upon his new duties.

Ira Parvin, of Sterling, Ill., has been called to the pastorate of the Auburn church. We understand that he has accepted and will begin his duties there Jan. 1. This is a happy union of church and pastor and we shall look for good reports from Auburn.

A. M. Hurd has accepted a call to the church at Tully, and has entered upon his duties. Bro. Hurd was pastor for four years, a number of years ago, of the church at Pompey. We welcome Bro. Hurd into our midst.

Prof. Philip Parsons, of Syracuse University is preaching for our church at Brewerton. Good reports come to us of his work. Bro. Parsons recently addressed the Interdenominational Ministerial Association of Syracuse and vicinity on "The Sociological View of the Church." The address was very favorably received by the ministers.

D. H. Bradbury reports the new parsonage at Throopsville nearly completed. We are glad to see Throopsville in line with this improvement during our "Jubilee Year." Let the good work go on.

The writer recently visited the churches of Northern New York. All are anxiously looking forward to greater things.

Most of the churches reporting the results of State Day are able to report their apportionment raised. We are aiming to make this year's offering worthy of "Our Jubilee Year." We can't hold a great Jubilee Convention unless a great "Jubilee Year" preceeds it. Let every church plan to make definite gains during this year.

The South Geddes St. Church of Syracuse is planning an evangelistic meeting in February with H. F. Lutz as evangelist and Wm. Leigh as singer. Prospects are good for a great meeting as the Bible school and the attendance at regular church services is the best in the history of the church.

Editors of Christian Century:—We are glad to note that the church of the disciples is taking rather seriously their only excuse for existence that is Christian union. Why should this not have been done years and years ago? We ought to make good on what we have preached for 101 years or go out of business. The most prominent topic for discussion among the ministers of this little city is Christian union. All are in sympathy with and favor the plan. But we can not practice it as yet. We must first start a revival and convert the people of all Protestant bodies. A. L. COLE,
Mt. Sterling, Ill.

Your Friend-- The Christian Century

When you think of your friends to whom you wish to make Christmas presents, do not forget your constant and intimate friend—The Christian Century.

We feel so secure in your affection that we make bold to suggest what gift would please us most. We do not ask you to buy anything for us. But if you would devote a little of your time and get a list of new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY it would please us more than any other thing.

And this is a gift in which we could reciprocate. Your own paper would be more valuable to you; and your friends whose subscriptions you received—think how they would be benefitted throughout the year!

Christmas time offers an ideal opportunity for all the friends of The Christian Century who have on many occasions expressed their appreciation in words to express it in a practical deed. You can help make a greater paper, if you will.

Begin to talk with your friends now.

If you send a list of five or more you may have a good commission on each new subscription, if you wish it.
